Need tickets? Good luck

Students seeking general admission tickets pick up reserve seats instead

DAN LEWERENZ
assistant campus editor

Once upon a time, students could show up at KSU Stadium on game day and sit wherever they pleased. Now, with ticket sales riding the crest of the football team's success, students find themselves at the mercy of the fee-payment schedule.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics reserved 9,700 seats for students for the 1996 season, with 6,524 available in general-admission sections. But with record numbers of students reserving season tickets in the spring, general-admission tickets disappeared fast during fee payment.

That left students rushing to pick up the remaining general-admission tickets and the athletic department scrambling to find more student seats.

"It's a pain," said Bob Cavello, director of business services for the athletic department, "but it's a nice problem to have."

By the second day of fee payment, no general admission tickets were available, leaving students the option of buying season tickets in one of the many reserved-seat student sections or trying to get single-game tickets for the games they want to attend.

"The only GA tickets left are the ones we've held for students who reserved them in the spring," Carol Adolph, athletic ticket manager, said. "We did make sure to save tickets for them."

More than 1,700 reserved seats in the stadium are marked for student use, with 1,220 more in bleachers behind stadium seating.

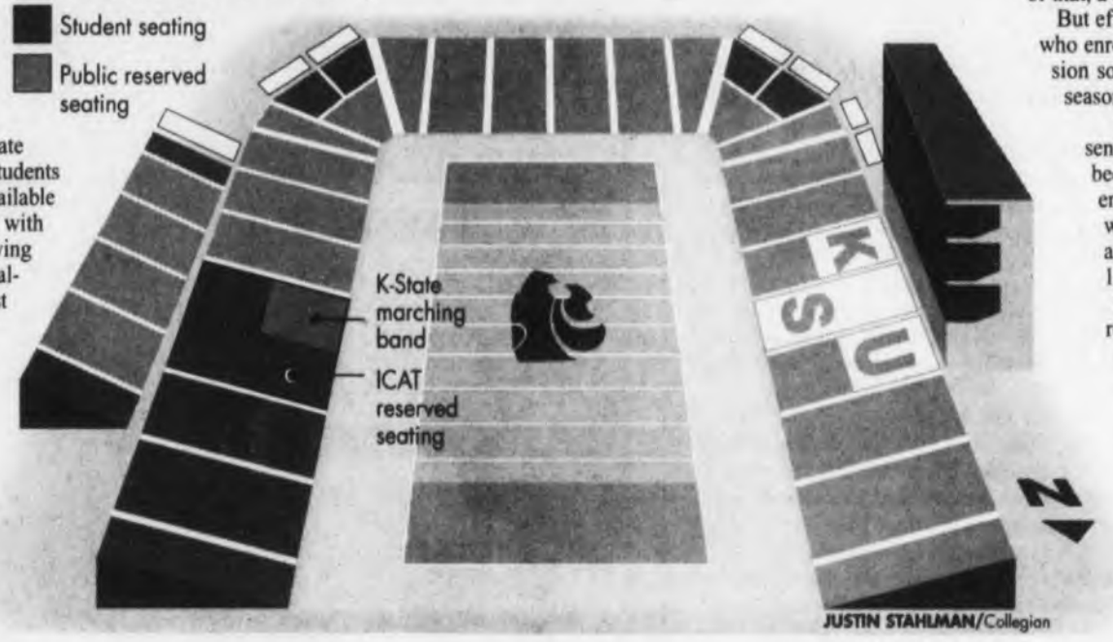
In addition, 390 seats in section 24 are reserved for the marching band and as many as 550 people can be admitted to undesignated student accommodations, including the grassy hill north of section 27.

"We've done everything we can to get as many students as possible in the stadium," Cavello said. "Our goal was to find 7,500 seats for students as per the agreement with student government, and we've got about 140 percent of that, a total of 10,640 seats."

But effort alone doesn't help those students who enrolled late only to find general admission sold out — many of whom have been season ticket holders for years.

"It was a shock," said Dan Snell, senior in electrical engineering. "I've been in GA for four years and when I enrolled at 8 a.m. on the third day they were gone. I've sat in ICAT every year, and now I'm going to be in section 19."

Snell, who has tickets to K-State's road games at Texas A&M, Colorado and Missouri, said he's not even sure whether he will buy basketball tickets this season.



Although the final numbers had not yet been calculated, Adolph said some reserved-seat tickets remained.

For the second consecutive year, the quick sale of general-admission tickets has forced the ICAT to temporarily stop taking memberships.

ICAT members pay $30 in dues for preferred seating in the general admission sections at football and basketball games in addition to receiving discounts from local businesses. The

Star Tribune links Wefald to Minnesota

The University of Minnesota is looking for a new president, and K-State President Jon Wefald might be on the list of candidates.

The University of Minnesota Board of Regents has not released the names of nominees for the position, but according to the Star Tribune (Minneapolis), unknown sources said Wefald might be a nominee.

"I am absolutely certain that it did not come from someone on the board," Steven Bosacker, executive director and corporate secretary for the University of Minnesota Board of Regents, said.

The board has not even selected finalists for the position yet and doesn't expect to do so until late November.

The selection process is still in its beginning stages. "We're in the process of soliciting nominations," Bosacker said. "We're hoping to do interviews in late October."

Once the board selects the finalists, it will release their names.

Wefald said that it would be speculative and premature to connect him with the position at this point. When asked whether he would consider the position if it were offered to him, he replied, "I don't know. I'd think about it."

Wefald has worked in Minnesota before. He was the chancellor of the Minnesota State University System before he came to K-State.

K-State dads rally at Democratic convention as Chicago delegates

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

Three K-State students have fathers who are delegates at the Democratic National Convention this week.

Dan Lykins, Topeka, and Michael Keating, Marysville, are two of Kansas' 42 delegates. The convention is today through Thursday in Chicago.

Michael Keating's daughter, Maggie Keating, is a sophomore in political science, and is also going to the convention.

She will be a volunteer for the Women's Leadership Forum of the Democratic National Committee.

Dan Lykins' son, Jeremy Lykins, is a senior in history and his daughter, Danya Lykins, is a sophomore undecided. His son Michael Lykins played football at K-State from 1988-1991.

Both Dan Lykins and Michael Keating will vote for Clinton at the convention.

However, the function of national party conventions is no longer to choose a candidate, Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science, said.

Primary elections do that, because their results determine how many delegates from each state will be committed to vote for each candidate.

The function of national conventions is to put together the party's platform and generate excitement about the candidate, and it is important for a party to coordinate its efforts behind one candidate in order to win, Unekis said.

Lykins is chairman of the Clinton-Gore campaign in Kansas. He is also treasurer of the state Democratic party.

This will be his second trip to a Democratic National Convention. He was a guest at the 1968 convention, which was also in Chicago. He said he hopes this trip will be different. Lykins graduated from K-State in 1968 and worked for Robert Kennedy that summer in Washington, D.C.

Sue Zschoche, assistant professor of history, said, "A lot of people remember Bobby Kennedy as the last politician who could talk to both sides."

Zschoche said in '68 there were constant conflicts between convention protesters and Chicago police, including one confrontation which was later called a police riot by a federal commission.

Zschoche said she does not think anything like that will happen at this year's convention.

"1968 is a very particular political context," she said.

Many factors contributed to the cultural climate, including the American military presence in Vietnam.

"Vietnam was simply the pivot point around which a massive cultural shift was focused," she said.

She said after the assassinations of Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968, many young people no longer believed they could really change the system.

Fee-forgetting students rack up fines, could face dropped class schedules

SPEED

▶ For students who face dropped schedules, re-enrollment begins on today.
However, to re-enroll, students must pay a $50 handling fee.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Forgetting to pay fees or meet financial-aid deadlines can result in more than just headaches.

The University will drop the schedule of any student who did not pay fees at Ahearn Field House on the appropriate day. If a student's schedule has been dropped, a re-enrollment period begins on Aug. 26. However, to re-enroll, the student must first pay a $50 handling fee.

R. Douglas Ackley, assistant controller for cashiers and student loans, said in the past the fee has been called a late fee, but it was renamed a handling fee for this semester.

Last year, the fee was $15 for the first 20 days of the semester and $35 thereafter, Ackley said.

Ackley said the $50 fee covers administrative costs associated with students' going outside of the standard system of pre-enrolling and paying fees during the University fee-payment period.

If students do not re-enroll within a week — which means by the deadline of Aug. 30 — their schedule will remain dropped, and their financial aid will be returned to the lender or aid program, he said.

According to the K-State fall line schedule, students can enroll after Aug. 30 only with the permission of the instructor and after Sept. 6 with permission of the dean of the college.

Ackley said the reason the University requires students to attend fee payment is to ensure that students are actually attending the University.

He said there are students who will be pre-enrolled at K-State and who have applied for financial aid, but who will opt to attend another university or college without notifying K-State of their plans.

"We don't want empty seats in classrooms, because that's an inconvenience to other students," Ackley said.

With the 1997 spring semester, students will no longer be required to be physically present to pay fees. The process of fee payment will be done through the mail.

However, Ackley said students would still need to notify K-State of their plans to attend the University.

He said K-State will send students notification of their enrollment and financial-aid status through the mail and students would need to complete a form to reply about their plans. If a student had excess financial aid, the University would cut them a check once the spring semester was under way, he said.

Students can also be charged for deferring the payment of their fees.

Ackley said if the financial-aid office or the lender is late getting the money to the University or the student, students can defer their fees for no charge.

If a student did not meet financial-aid deadlines or failed to complete the necessary forms, there is a $50 handling fee for the deferment

Say farewell to fee payment at Ahearn

SARA EDWARDS
campus editor

The heat, the long lines and the crowds that have been a part of fee payment in Ahearn Field House will soon be a memory.

Starting in spring 1997, students will pay fees by mail. After pre-enrollment, students will be sent their tuition bills in the mail.

R. Douglas Ackley, assistant controller for cashiers and student loans, said the whole process will be reduced.

"I think it will be advantageous," he said.

Students will have the opportunity to pay their tuition and fees before winter break or in early January. The deadline for payment is Jan. 8.

After that date students who have not paid will have their classes dropped, Ackley said.

Ackley said students who re-enroll in their dropped classes will have an opportunity to pay tuition at the K-State Student Union.

Students who get money back at fee payment will also be able to pick up their checks at the Union.

Another semester, another long line

CLAUDIA KEELER, Wichita, writes a tuition check for her son, Jesse Keeler, as he and his sister, Meghan Keeler, watch Friday in Ahearn Field House. It took the Keelers about 20 minutes to pay fees for Jesse Keeler, a freshman in computer engineering. About 18,000 students pay fees during the three days of fee payment. Students will not have to return early to pay fees for the spring semester because K-State will allow fees to be paid by mail.

Student credit denied in Ahearn

campus editor

Some students who have always depended on charging their tuition on credit cards were not prepared to pay tuition through other means last week.

K-State no longer accepts credit cards for fee payment. Instead, a payment plan and credit-card cash advances are offered, R. Douglas Ackley, assistant controller for cashiers and student loans, said.

Chris McClatchey, graduate student in electrical engineering, said he had planned on using his debit card, but because of the change he paid with checks.

"The cash advance was funny. They charge," he said.

Ackley said the reason K-State will not accept credit cards is the state will not pay the service charge for credit cards, and the University can't afford it.

"The governor won't let us use credit cards anymore," he said.

Students who had planned on paying with credit cards when they came through fee payment could still go through the cash-advance line with their credit cards.

"This was installed for students who can't pay any other way," Ackley said.

When students take the advance no cash actually changes hands. It is all done in the background, he said.

K-State doesn't pay the service charge, but students must pay their bank a fee for using the cash-advance service.

"Taking a cash advance against a credit card is just like going to a bank and getting cash with your credit card," Ackley said.

Students were also offered the option of paying their tuition in installments through a company called Academic Management Services.

Students pay a one-time $25 fee for the service. They pay one-third of their bill at fee payment, one-third Sept. 15 and one-third Oct. 15.

Ackley said a mailing was sent out in June to advise students of the change. He said most students were satisfied and he had heard few complaints at fee payment.

Linear tuition brings in mixed reviews

SARA EDWARDS
campus editor

Many students paying linear tuition for the first time were caught by surprise at fee payment, either paying more or less than they expected.

R. Douglas Ackley, assistant controller for cashiers and student loans, said linear fees enabled students to graduate with the same amount of hours paying about the same tuition regardless of the number of semesters it took them to get through college.

"Overall it's more equitable for students," he said.

Ackley said the flat tuition students paid last year is comparable to what students are paying for about 13 hours under the new linear-tuition system.

The tuition a student pays depends on the number of hours a student takes. Fees are determined on the linear scale until 12 hours. For 12 hours and more students are charged one flat fee.

Many non-traditional students and students taking fewer hours said they found the new tuition system beneficial. It's more fair than flat tuition, especially for non-traditional students, David McComas, junior in feed science, said.

Although some students found themselves paying more tuition, many at least agreed the system was fair.

"It cost me more. It probably is a good idea. A lot of colleges do it. It would happen eventually," Jeremy Platt, sophomore in business, said.

WITH EASE, a student passes between fee-payment stations inside Ahearn Field House. Students who paid in the morning missed the large crowds.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

No tickets? That's the way the football bounces

Hey, Wildcat fans — the first contest of the Big 12 Conference is Saturday.

You did not get tickets, you say? Whose fault is that?

It is the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' fault. By the way, it is your fault, too.

WHY WE CARE

Several angry students missed out on season ticket sales. We have a few suggestions about how that can be avoided in the future.

After three successful seasons under Coach Bill Snyder, the athletic department has to calculate creative ways to seat new fans who want to attend games. But it does not want to upset those fans who have stood by the program through the bad years.

After the recent mess at fee payment, the athletic department should realize its calculations were way off, and it ticked off students.

On the other hand, about 1,000 students reserved their general-admission tickets at pre-enrollment. Those people were guaranteed their season tickets at fee payment. Those students will be at the game Saturday. Where were you?

You didn't see the ticket table at pre-enrollment? The athletic department should have publicized sales better and made the student body more aware that if it did not reserve tickets then, it would not be guaranteed tickets.

With fee payment being at Ahearn for the last time this semester, a new ticket-dispersal system will have to be worked out. The athletic department should begin to make sure students do not get left out of the stadium next year.

We have a few suggestions.

First, increase the amount of general-admission seating in these ways: 1) Stop selling new season tickets to alumni until students have a chance to purchase theirs. This does not mean bumping the 20-year ticket holder. 2) All student sections should be general admission. Forget about reserved student sections. Any student who has a ticket to a student section should treat it as general admission. If a student section is full, stadium officials should direct the student to a different student section.

Second, the athletic department should find a fair way of dispersing tickets. Some people favor the idea of seniority. The athletic department could also implement a campout for football tickets, much like the campout for basketball tickets.

Either way, don't blame the athletic department. Help find a way to make the system better.

The healthiest way to express hostility

The tradition on the Collegian opinion page is for the opinion editor – that being who I am – to write a column on the first day of the paper every semester to explain a few things.

I feel like I'm being more than a little redundant doing this, because most of you have been here for a few years and know all about the wonders and mysticism of the opinion page. Or so I should hope.

But there are probably quite a few of you who are reading the Collegian for the first time. I'd like to welcome you.

It is for you that I will run a quick refresher course.

First of all, the opinion page is just that: a page of opinions. An opinion, as defined by Webster's Dictionary, is "a belief stronger than an impression but less strong than positive knowledge."

Despite what they might think, the columnists' words are not gospel. Nor is the editorial. And neither are the letters to the editor. They are just (say it with me) opinions.

The only thing on this page that is the absolute and total truth and can be considered to be gospel is what I write. Just kidding.

Now many of you might be wondering what those things — columns, editorials and letters to the editor — might be and what the difference is between them.

Well, that's what I'm here to tell you all about.

- Column. This is an opinion written by one person. It is solely the opinion of the person with the little photo standing next to it. It is not my opinion, unless I wrote it. It is not the Collegian's, the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications' nor Student Publications Inc.'s opinion.
- Editorial. This is the opinion you find at the top of the page. The editorial board meets every day to discuss a topic. This is the opinion of the editorial board. It is not necessarily the opinion of Student Publications or the journalism school.

Now, if you have any convictions and we do our job correctly, you're going to get really pissed off at some opinion expressed on this page.

What can you do about this?

I mean, you have to do something. If you let your anger fester, fester, fester, you'll end up all bitter and live a miserable, pathetic life.

I just want to tell you now, the Collegian is not responsible for your psychological therapy should you choose not to release your anger in one of the following healthy ways.

What are these healthy ways to release your anger and heal the pain?

- Letters to the editor. This is the best and most effective ways of dealing with your outrage. You send me a letter expressing all your pent-up emotions via e-mail or snail mail, or bring it to me at Kedzie 116, and you feel all better. And they don't all have to be negative, either. Be kind. I'm fragile. But really, this is your opportunity to participate in the content of the opinion page. Dare to dream, eh?

So, you might ask yourself, who is this chick who knows all this opinion stuff and how did she get so smart — not to mention good looking — not that the mug shot is any indication of that?

Well, I'm Sera. Yup. That's how it's spelled, but pronounced Sara.

I've worked at the Collegian for three years in various capacities. But this is the last one. And this is the semester I will be opinion editor. That means I will be reading the columns, designing pages, typing your letters, occasionally writing a column, answering your questions and a few other tasks.

So that's about all. I hope you'll let me know in one way or another — preferably non-violent — what you think of the opinion page this semester.

Feel free to call me if you have any questions, suggestions or opinions.

SCHOOL DAYS

Feeling-like-a-disallusioned-unmotivated-fool days

Today is the first day of school.

We're wearing our new school shoes and have freshly sharpened pencils and blank notebooks. At least we did when we began our freshman year. I don't consider that an insult to freshmen. In fact, it gives me hope.

I began my long journey through this university last fall with my new schoolbag full of hopes and dreams. I was thrilled by all the free stuff, awed by the size of the campus and mildly amused by my inability to find parking.

For some reason this fall, I considered injuring the pushers outside enrollment, discovered Ackert Hall is in a different state than Kedzie Hall and realized the only thing having a parking permit gets you is the hope that someday you will get to park.

However, I still bought a really cool new bag, the kind with all the neato zipper pockets and a padded strap. It is my feeble attempt at getting motivated and organized for the coming semester.

I also bought a Goosebumps backpack and a Batman and Robin backpack for my sons.

My 5-year-old started kindergarten last week. He was thrilled with all his freshly packed school supplies, awed by the size of his new school and mildly amused by the chaos of children rushing for their buses at the end of the day.

By mid-January, this same little boy, Ethan, will have just half a box of broken crayons, gotten lost on his way to the library one too many times and pushed over little girls to get on the bus.

Ah, the thrill of education.

Why does the school system, be it kindergarten or college algebra, seem to kill our motivation?

I came to K-State with pre-med dreams, then realized all I have ever wanted to do in life was write and became a journalism student. I had grandiose visions of earning a master's degree in mass communications and changing the world through my brilliant compositions.

A short year later, I would settle for a job writing anything anywhere I made more money a year than I get from student loans and grants.

Ethan starts his academic career a little differently. He wants to be the best hitter on the Chicago White Sox or a professional wrestler when he grows up. I hope he holds on to his dreams, but I know by the time he is in sixth grade the motivation may be gone.

His great aspirations will have been sucked out by the school system. He won't be able to fight it.

To quote a Star Trek episode, "Resistance is futile. You will be assimilated."

Well, I am not going to let this University suck my aspirations.

This year I am going to get to campus earlier to find a parking space and have a warm fan loaf as my reward. I plan to stock up on the free stuff for later in the semester when all the money runs out. I am going to periodically buy new pencils.

I am going to get involved with stuff on campus. I bought tickets to McCain Auditorium events and plan to attend a sporting event of some sort.

There are things the system could do to rekindle my will.

To my professors: I'd like to complete a course this semester feeling as if I have learned something, not just regurgitated information onto Scantron sheets.

To the Collegian: I'd like to read about the people who make up this campus. K-State is not made up of departments, colleges, organizations and teams. It is made up of flesh and blood with hopes and dreams.

To Parking Services: I'd like to have pity upon you for having such thankless jobs that expose you to so much abuse, but I can't.

To sports programs: Please remember this University produces more teachers, writers, engineers, accountants, computer scientists and biologists than professional athletes. That's a perspective we can all use.

I hope someday my little boy will be the exception. Ethan Smith, K-State graduate, will have the highest batting average on the Chicago White Sox.

As for me, I will change the world in whatever way I can, great or small.

The secret for staying motivated is simple. Buy a new school bag every year, and maybe even invest in some new school shoes.

But most importantly, let the system that tries to suck you dry, kiss your aspirations.

Misleading advertisement

Editor,

I saw a campaign advertisement for newly appointed Sen. Sheila Frahm, R-Kan. She said while Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Manhattan, was the Kansas Secretary of Agriculture, the spending for the department increased by 48 percent. The ad infers Brownback was not fiscally responsible with Kansas' tax money. This does not seem to be consistent with what we know of Brownback's frugality with the taxpayers' funds.

I contacted the Brownback office, knowing if Frahm's statement was correct, there had to be more to the story.

The rest of the story is that because of Brownback's efficient management, programs from several other departments were added to the responsibility of the Department of Agriculture.

The Petroleum Measurement Enforcement section was added from the Department of Revenue, dam safety inspection responsibility was transferred from the Department of Health and Environment, and Brownback also was given responsibility for a number of other functions that had previously been under the Department of Transportation.

Anyone familiar with government budgetary processes knows budget increases are commensurate with increased functions, responsibilities or clientele. I consider it to be a compliment to Brownback's supervisory abilities that responsibilities were shifted from other departments.

We know as our representative to Congress, Brownback has cut the amount of office expenditures by 20 percent, spending $160,000 less of our tax money than his predecessor. We know each month he has returned 10 percent of his pay to be applied to the national debt.

We know Brownback has been in the forefront of efforts in Washington to restore financial responsibility and to deal with the albatross of the national debt that threatens the economic stability of our nation. We have a consistent record of his service and voting record.

It concerns me that Frahm would resort to half-truth to deceive voters about Brownback's record. Her method insults the intelligence of Kansas voters about the workings of our state. Kansans need a senator committed to integrity and fiscal responsibility.

Brownback has been a congressional leader in consistently confronting the bloated federal budget and national debt. The difference between the candidates is clean and becomes even more pronounced because of Frahm's use of half-truths and false innuendoes.

Now she is claiming responsibility for balancing seven budgets and reducing taxes in Kansas by $1.3 billion. It is true she was a part of an administration that did this, but it was done because her colleagues overrode her votes to increase taxes. Cut through the rhetoric to the record, and voters will conclude Brownback is the choice of U.S. Senate.

dues go to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund.

Because ICAT seating is contained within the general-admission section, when general-admission seats are sold out, ICAT seats are no longer available.

Snell said he thought former ICAT members should have the opportunity to sign up before new members.

"If you've been in ICAT before, you should get some sort of seniority," he said. "And as far as GA tickets go, open up more sections. We are the bread and butter of the fans."

Students who did get ICAT memberships will notice changes in their section — most notablym fewer non-members sneaking in.

Kirby Hocutt, assistant director of marketing and promotions for the athletic department, said the ICAT Board, comprised of students, has found a better way to keep non-members out of the section.

"One of the first issues that came up was security at football games," he said. "We developed a membership card with six numbers for the six games.

"Students will have to get their card punched and receive a wristband to get into the section. The wristbands will change each game."

Hocutt said ICAT memberships will again become available in October for basketball games.

that is charged to the student, he said.

Most students defer their fee payments only if their financial aid has not been sent to the University.

However, Larry Moeder, director of the student financial assistance office, said there were fewer deferments this semester compared to previous semesters, mainly because most of the financial aid was sent to K-State in time for fee payment.

"It's been a great process this year," Moeder said.

He said the University had taken the payments out of most students' financial aid and prepared checks from the balance before students came to fee payment.

Next semester's fee payment and financial-aid process will be similar to the fall semester's, but will be done by mail, he said.

It won't be until fall 1997 that the University will be able to credit the entire financial-aid payment to a student's account and then cut a check for the balance, he said.

The student financial assistance office will be open 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. next week Monday through Friday and is in Fairchild 104.

K-State student attends Democratic convention

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

There is a K-State student at the Democratic National Convention this week in Chicago.

Maggie Keating, sophomore in political science, is at the convention to help with Women Win '96, a reception honoring first lady Hillary Clinton and Tipper Gore.

Gore is the founder and honorary chair of Women's Leadership Forum of the Democratic National Committee, the group sponsoring the event.

The forum is sponsoring the event in cooperation with the women's division of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Emily's List. Emily's List is a group that raises money to help elect pro-choice candidates.

The event also coincides with the 76th anniversary of women winning the right to vote, which is today.

The Women's Leadership Forum was founded by Gore to encourage women to get actively involved in politics.

"A lot of women don't go out and vote," Keating said. "And more importantly, they leave the check-writing up to their husbands."

> "It's important to get women out there taking part and not just standing in the shadows of their man."
> • MAGGIE KEATING
> SOPHOMORE IN POLITIAL SCIENCE

Keating said raising money is important.

"The money that comes from these events goes toward getting women elected and to mobilize Democratic women," she said.

She said tickets to Women Win '96 cost $125, which is cheaper than many political events. She said this price sets the tone for the event.

"It's important to get women out there taking part," she said, "and not just standing in the shadows of their man."

Keating said she thinks the Democrats' focus on women's issues will help them in this fall's elections.

"We're the ones who care about child care and making sure our kids are educated," she said.

Keating has been in Chicago since Friday. Saturday she helped register Women's Leadership Forum members as they arrived. Last night she attended another reception.

The reception is 2-4 p.m. today at the Sheraton Hotel in Chicago.

▸ CITY

Manhattan community to hear new bike-trail plans at meeting

SARA EDWARDS
campus editor

Preliminary plans are in place to turn the haphazard bicycle system into a system of trails extending through the Manhattan community, Mark Taussig, University landscape architect, said.

Plans for a city and University bicycle trail will be presented at a meeting at 7 p.m. Sept. 12 in Union 207.

"This plan is just to get us started and focused on the ideas," he said.

K-State students and Manhattan citizens are invited to come and give their input, Taussig said.

"This is a chance for the public to look at the plans and make suggestions," he said.

Taussig said he hopes the meeting will promote bicycle use and safety as well as address issues such as bicycle-parking policies.

Taussig said K-State would be the hub of the bicycle system. The trails will be more intense around the University and will follow important routes through town.

The bicycle system will be paid for with money from the City/University Tax Fund. Land Plan Engineering of Kansas City was hired for consultation on the plans. It will be facilitating the meeting, Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said.

She said the civil-rights movement, the peace movement and the cultural split between the generations also affected the cultural climate in 1968.

Zschoche said there is no issue today that could drive a split in a party like Vietnam did, and both the Republican and Democratic parties are driven by economic issues.

"There's not much to argue about," she said. "People won't say 'I'm for economic growth,' or 'I'm against economic growth.'"

Keating said he will be involved in rural and agricultural issues, and Lykins said he will meet with the other Clinton-Gore state campaign chairs, and go to one meeting over which President Clinton will preside.

Hansen, Otto gear up

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

Chris Hansen and Aaron Otto said they want to create a better relationship between the student body and the Student Governing Association.

Hansen, student body president, and Otto, student body vice president, designated every Friday Feedback Friday in their office. Anyone will be able to drop in during the lunch hour and talk to Hansen and Otto about student issues in their office in the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

E-mail is another way to contact Hansen, Otto or student senators, and Hansen said people are always welcome to call him in his office or at home.

Otto said, "It's fun for me to be a resource person."

Hansen said they have been doing a lot of research and preparation work this summer, but the most time-consuming project this year will be teacher evaluations.

They said they want to publish certain parts of the current TEVALs. Some parts would remain confidential so only faculty members would see them.

Hansen and Otto are also using other universities to develop their proposal.

"There's a lot of models out there. We're kind of picking and choosing the basic models we like," Hansen said.

They also said they want to reorganize student government. Otto said K-State's student government structure has been the same since the mid-1960s.

"A lot of student governments have gone through and either merged, consolidated or just changed with the times," Otto said.

They are considering changing the way students are represented. Otto said many schools no longer elect senators strictly by academic colleges.

"Maybe they'll have some academic, some from where you live, some from what groups you might be involved in multicultural-wise," he said.

Janelle Moore, social services liaison for SGA, said Hansen and Otto have created many new positions in their cabinet and have been proactive.

"Everyone sounds really pumped up for their jobs," she said.

Hansen and Otto said they are also planning a Safe Housing Week in September. Otto said the purpose is to make students aware of the free inspections the city will do, so students can be sure their houses or apartments are safe.

They also plan to visit the campus groups they visited during their campaign last spring and improve campus security through work on the security cameras and the escort service.

Hansen and Otto also said if people want to get involved in SGA, four positions on their cabinet are still open. Any student can apply. The positions are governmental relations director, multicultural affairs director, greek coordinator and associate college council member.

The deadline to apply is Sept. 6. Applications are available in the Office of Student Activities and Services or by calling Hansen.

Students scrambling for job prospects

JEREMY KELLEY
staff reporter

As the school year rapidly approaches, many students try frantically to seek employment.

With various weekly expenses to pay for while going to school, most independent students need a steady source of income to pay for such things as parties, food and clothes.

Many students have put in job applications for employment, and most employers are swamped with applications.

"At this time we are looking for employees for the school year," Ray Muloenaux, manager of Pyramid Pizza, said. "I have a stack of at least 30 applications on my desk."

Muloenaux will conduct interviews in the coming weeks and put his fall staff together. Not only are jobs for attaining income, but many students also use work as a tool to socialize with others, to gain responsibility and to mature.

"I think it is good for students to get jobs because it teaches them responsibility and financial management," Nikki Booth, assistant manager at Little Caesar's Pizza, said. "It helps them also to manage their time between studies, parties, et cetera."

BRIDGET DEGHAND, junior in interior design, consults her boyfriend about a job opening while looking at the job board Friday, in the K-State Student Union. Deghand was hoping to find a clerical job.

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Some of the employers in the area had students apply before the summer to ensure employment for the school year.

"We had some employees who quit for the summer because of internships or other work, start work here again," Muloenaux said. "We had a couple of people who applied last May that got jobs for this year."

Some men even found work at sororities as house boys.

"I don't consider it work really," Cy McCormack, junior in journalism and mass communications and Gamma Phi Beta house boy, said. "I make a little money on the side, and plus, it is an easy way to meet girls."

The second annual Jayhawk Music Festival drew a crowd of around 10,000 people.

The concert, at Clinton Lake State Park, featured 19 bands on three stages and plenty of anxious fans waiting for the music to start at 11 a.m.

"I couldn't believe there were that many people here that early," Jeremiah Johnson, lead singer and guitarist for the band Detar-X, said.

Detar-X started off the show in the morning with a 40-minute set of music that was similar to Candlebox with a slight blues twist.

"We're trying to go back to a bluesier sound with a modern edge, something you can groove to," Johnson said.

This year's Jayhawk Music Festival had bands with many different styles for the different tastes of music connoisseurs in attendance. For example, the band Shag seemed to be a modern-day offshoot of George Clinton and the Parliamentary Funk. With its freaky costumes and face-painted lead singer, Shag sang catchy songs that grew on listeners.

Fortunately, the weather at this year's festival cooperated with the concert promoters and allowed the show to go on under a blanket of clouds. The clouds didn't stay for long, though.

Around noon, the clouds parted and sunshine poured in. Some might have thought this was a good sign; however, the medical staff at the concert hoped it wouldn't turn out like last year.

The 1995 Jayhawk Music Festival was unorganized and became extremely hot. Around 40 concert-goers were hospitalized for heat exhaustion, and water was scarce.

"We learned a lot from last year," Rob Kort, operations supervisor for Douglas County Ambulance, said.

Kort said the concert was much more organized than last year. He explained there were several teams of medical staff members roaming around each stage in case of any type of accident.

With more than 10,000 people present, plenty of water was on hand at the medical tent, and that fact was well-publicized on the radio and by walking medical staff.

"We're hoping for the best but are prepared to handle everything from minor cuts to major accidents," Kort said.

Moshers at the concert concerned the medical staff. Medical staff trying to get into a mosh pit during a song to help someone could have run into some trouble.

"We won't go into a mosh pit. They have to come to us," Kort said.

As the old adage says, the show must go on, and it did exactly that. Groups like Self and Semisonic brought loud, fast music to the scene. These acts shaped the crowd into a heavy mosh pit that really got the concert going.

"We only got 40 minutes. We got to rock you guys," bellowed the lead singer of Self to the already-sweating fans.

At one point in the set, Self sang a degrading song about Alanis Morrisette to the melody of "Ironic," which made the crowd go nuts. With bands rocking away on two different stages, concert-goers had plenty of bands to see. When they wanted to take a break from the music, there were dozens of tents selling everything from concert shirts to beads and necklaces.

Country band mixes it up at Kickers

MATT BASLER

Not many country-music groups sing "Amarillo By Morning" followed by "YMCA."

Find a place where the country band New West is playing to witness this.

New West played its diversified set of music in front of a big crowd at Kickers Saloon & Grill Friday.

Because the band only plays cover songs, it has a wide variety to choose from when it plans its set.

Unlike other country bands, New West focuses on getting people hyped up and enjoying themselves rather than playing straight country music.

At any given concert, you can hear New West singing anything from Little Texas to Van Halen to Clarence Carter's "Strokin'."

"We try to cater to dancers and a young audience," Arthur White, lead singer and bassist, said. "We're just a pop act with a steel guitar."

Many bands try to cover songs, only to fail miserably. However, New West pulled it off. Their unique sound performing such songs as "My Maria" by Brooks & Dunn and "That Summer" by Garth Brooks is full of energy. You can only go to a Brooks & Dunn concert to hear any better. New West tends to stay more on the upbeat side by playing fast songs with a little foolishness added.

"We're too damn goofy, and that's the way it goes," White said to the crowd.

Whether the songs were a slow or fast tempo, people were always out on the dance floor having a good time. Those who weren't dancing were in their seats with their feet moving to the rhythm.

1ST SGT. STEVEN RATHERS hugs his wife, Francine, after returning from Bosnia, while the company commander, Capt. William Ledbetter, holds his 8-month-old son, William Sheldon Ledbetter.

While most K-State students left town this summer, life on campus and in Manhattan did not stop. For those who did not read the Collegian through the summer months, we present a brief update.

More than 60,000 country-western fans came to the Manhattan area in late June to attend the Country Stampede at Tuttle Creek State Park. Performers at the three-day event included Tim McGraw, Faith Hill, Tracy Lawrence and Jeff Foxworthy.

According to police reports, a domestic disturbance at the event ended in the stabbing and death of David Shoop of Wichita. Shoop's girlfriend, Tina Springwater, Wichita, was charged with second-degree murder. Witnesses reported that Springwater and Shoop had been noticeably intoxicated and had been fighting all night. Jared Weidmann of Kansas City, Mo., who was camping at the neighboring site, said, "His arm fell off the stab wound, and I asked her, 'What is that?' She said, 'I stabbed him. I killed him. I killed him. He told me to.'"

• Public safety offices moved during the summer. The facilities department and K-State Police, as well as Parking Services, are now in Edwards Hall, south of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

• A full-time classified employee was fired during the ongoing investigation of monies embezzled from the Student Governing Association foundation account. An internal audit was launched after vendors complained they had not been paid. The amount of funds embezzled has not been disclosed. The Kansas Bureau of Investigation is leading the investigation. No charges have been filed.

• About 700 K-State students did not return to K-State this semester, according to the June 17 Collegian. University Registrar Donald Foster said 697 students were dismissed and 2,014 students were placed on academic warning out of the 18,533 students enrolled last spring.

Violence increases

> Any time you increase the number of people and students in an area, you are going to have more crime.
> • LT. RODNEY JAGER
> RILEY COUNTY POLICE DEPARTMENT

■ As thousands of K-State students return, Manhattan experiences more crime.

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

Long lines at local businesses and traffic jams are not the only things that increase as students return to K-State. The crime rate goes up, too.

"Any time you increase the number of people and students in an area, you are going to have more crime," said Lt. Rodney Jager of the Riley County Police Department.

After 23 years on the police force, Jager said he has seen this pattern of crime year after year. Even so, he said he feels Manhattan is a safe town. There hasn't been a significant increase in crime outside of this pattern.

In order to combat this yearly surge of crime, the RCPD increases the number of its patrol officers in traditional problem areas such as Aggieville.

Jager said in an area as small as Aggieville, with so many students and so much alcohol, there are bound to be some problems.

Overall, Riley County's crime rate is lower than the crime rate of many other counties in the state.

According to the latest crime report by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in 1993, Riley County had a substantially lower crime rate than Reno County. Both counties have more than 60,000 residents, but Reno County had 3,158 crime-index offenses compared to Riley County with 2,831.

A crime-index offense is one of the seven countable crimes: murder, rape, aggravated assault, battery, theft or auto theft. This combined total of crimes determines the crime rate for a particular city, county or state.

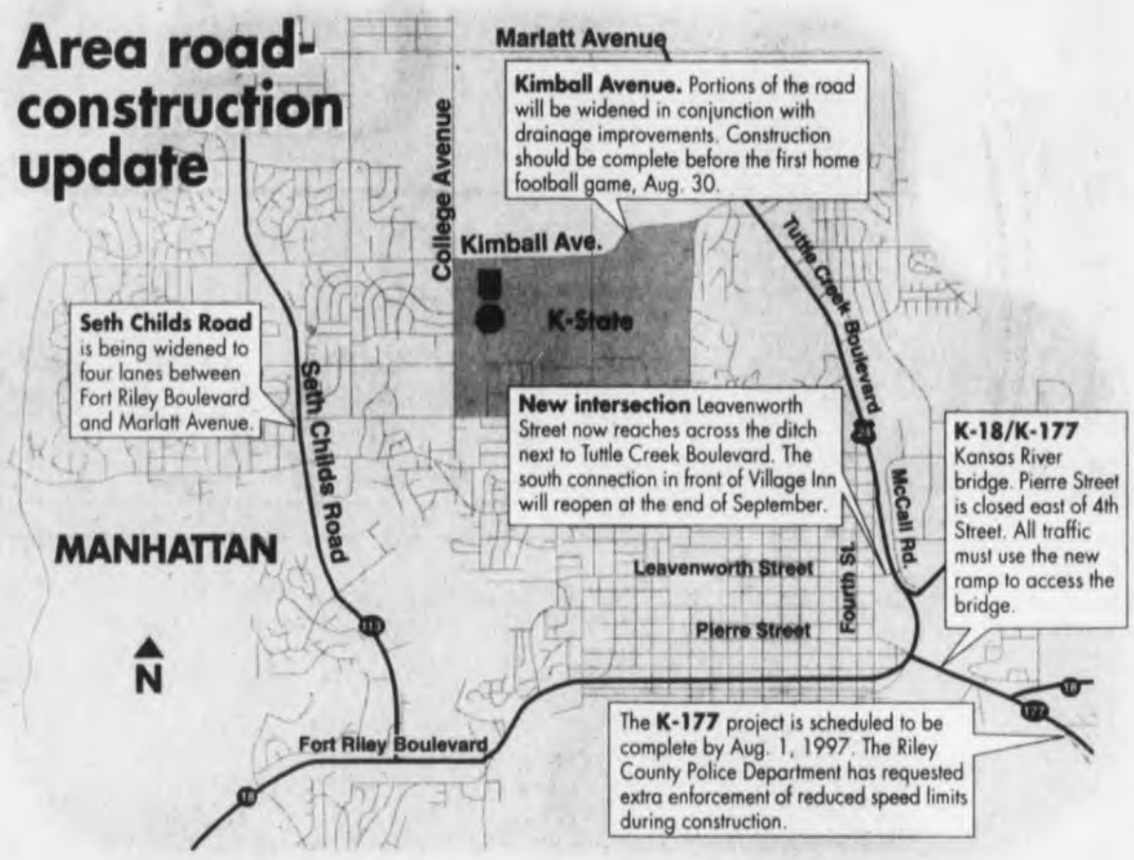
The K-State crime rate has decreased with the drop in number of students.

In 1992, with more than 26,000 students, the total number of violent and property crimes was 499.

In 1994, with 24,055 students, the total was 367.

Programs such as the escort service and the emergency call boxes help to keep students safe.

Walking in pairs in well-lit areas can help students from becoming victims of these crimes, Jager said. Students should follow these tips both on and off campus.



Students needing an escort can call 395-SAFE (7233) to be connected with the dispatcher, who will ask specifics about where students are coming from and where they are going.

The dispatcher will then coordinate an escort for the student. This service is available to and from any campus location.

Call boxes located at more than 20 places around campus are direct lines to the campus police.

Laurie Harrison, K-State Police dispatcher, said students should use these boxes for emergencies, but students have been known to use them when there wasn't a phone near and they had locked keys in their cars.

Bomb threat shuts down Union

> I wasn't scared at all. I totally felt like it was just a kid pranking. It sounded like a little kid trying not to laugh.

■ Apparent prank call results in evacuation of workers, search of premises.

NICOLE KIRBY

A bomb threat forced K-State Student Union employees to evacuate the building last Tuesday.

K-State Union Bookstore employee Jenny Burrington, junior in pre-art therapy, received a call at 2:10 p.m. warning her there was a bomb in the building and it would go off in 15 minutes.

"I wasn't scared at all. I totally felt like it was just a kid pranking," Burrington said. "It sounded like a little kid trying not to laugh."

The caller didn't specify where the bomb was, so the Union was evacuated while employees searched for explosives, and Union personnel and K-State Police officers guarded the doors to keep people from entering.

Jack Thoman, assistant director of business affairs, guarded the east entrance after the evacuation.

"I was in a meeting, and they came running in and said to get out," Thoman said. "It would not be great for business in the next few days if someone wants to get cute with this when everyone wants to buy books."

After half an hour, no bomb had been discovered, and there was no explosion. Employees and patrons were readmitted to the building at 2:40 p.m.

Police do not have a suspect, but the investigation continues.

Buffalo roam the Konza Prairie again

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANHATTAN — Oh, give me a home where the buffalo roam. They're coming back to the Kansas prairie.

It was midmorning as the Jeep ground along a rutted trail on the rolling Konza Prairie Research Natural Area a few miles south of Manhattan.

Tom Van Slyke, the prairie's site manager, was looking for the Konza's bison herd.

"They could be anywhere out here today," he said.

At the crest of a steep hill he unlocked a 10-foot-high gate. Beyond the gate lay land where the bison roam free.

He drove on, following a trail high on the ridge.

He spotted the first bison shortly after noon, a lone bull on a hillside across a deep valley.

> We'll get closer. Not too close, though. We give them a lot of respect. They're wild animals and spook real easy.

> PRAIRIE SITE MANAGER

The bull — black-faced, humped, dark-coated, huge — grazed in majestic solitude.

"He's maybe 8 years old, 2,000 pounds," Van Slyke said.

"We'll get closer. Not too close, though. We give them a lot of respect. They're wild animals and spook real easy."

He headed toward a promontory above the animal and stopped just above where the bull had been grazing.

He walked to the lip of the hill and looked down.

"He's not there," Van Slyke said.

He walked along the ridge, hands shading his eyes, searching the valley. But all was empty save for two white-tailed deer bounding through a gap in the distance.

The old bull had vanished.

The bison herds were gone from eastern Kansas by the mid-1850s. The last wild bison ever seen near Manhattan wandered out along Wildcat Creek one day in 1857.

No one knew where he came from, a lone remnant of a once countless horde.

"Far and near the prairie is alive with buffalo," wrote frontier observer Francis Parkman in 1846. "Now like black specks dotting the distant READY ... or not?

■ Texas Tech rides into Manhattan this week for the first Big 12 showdown, but injuries are plaguing the Wildcats on both ends of the field.

TODD STEWART

Just days before fall practice began, Coach Bill Snyder got the break he was not looking for.

Literally.

And then it was déjà vu all over again.

First it was cornerback Joe Gordon, a two-time first-team all-Big 8 selection, who suffered a broken left leg in an informal passing drill. Gordon is not expected to return to the field until Oct. 5 when the Wildcats meet Nebraska at KSU Stadium.

Then, on Aug. 21, lightning struck yet again.

Junior running back Eric Hickson broke two bones in his lower left leg during a scrimmage for Fan Appreciation Day. Hickson is out for the season.

The leading rusher for the Wildcats last year, Hickson set a school record by averaging 5.2 yards per carry while sharing time with junior Mike Lawrence. Hickson rushed for 816 yards last season, including a season-high 144 yards at Iowa State.

Just days before his injury, however, Hickson said he had loftier goals for this season.

"I want to get 1,000 yards," Hickson said. "Last year I fell just short, and this year I want to get it."

With that opportunity blown, the job is up to Hickson's replacements, Lawrence and sophomore Marlon Charles. Both combined for 723 yards on the ground last year.

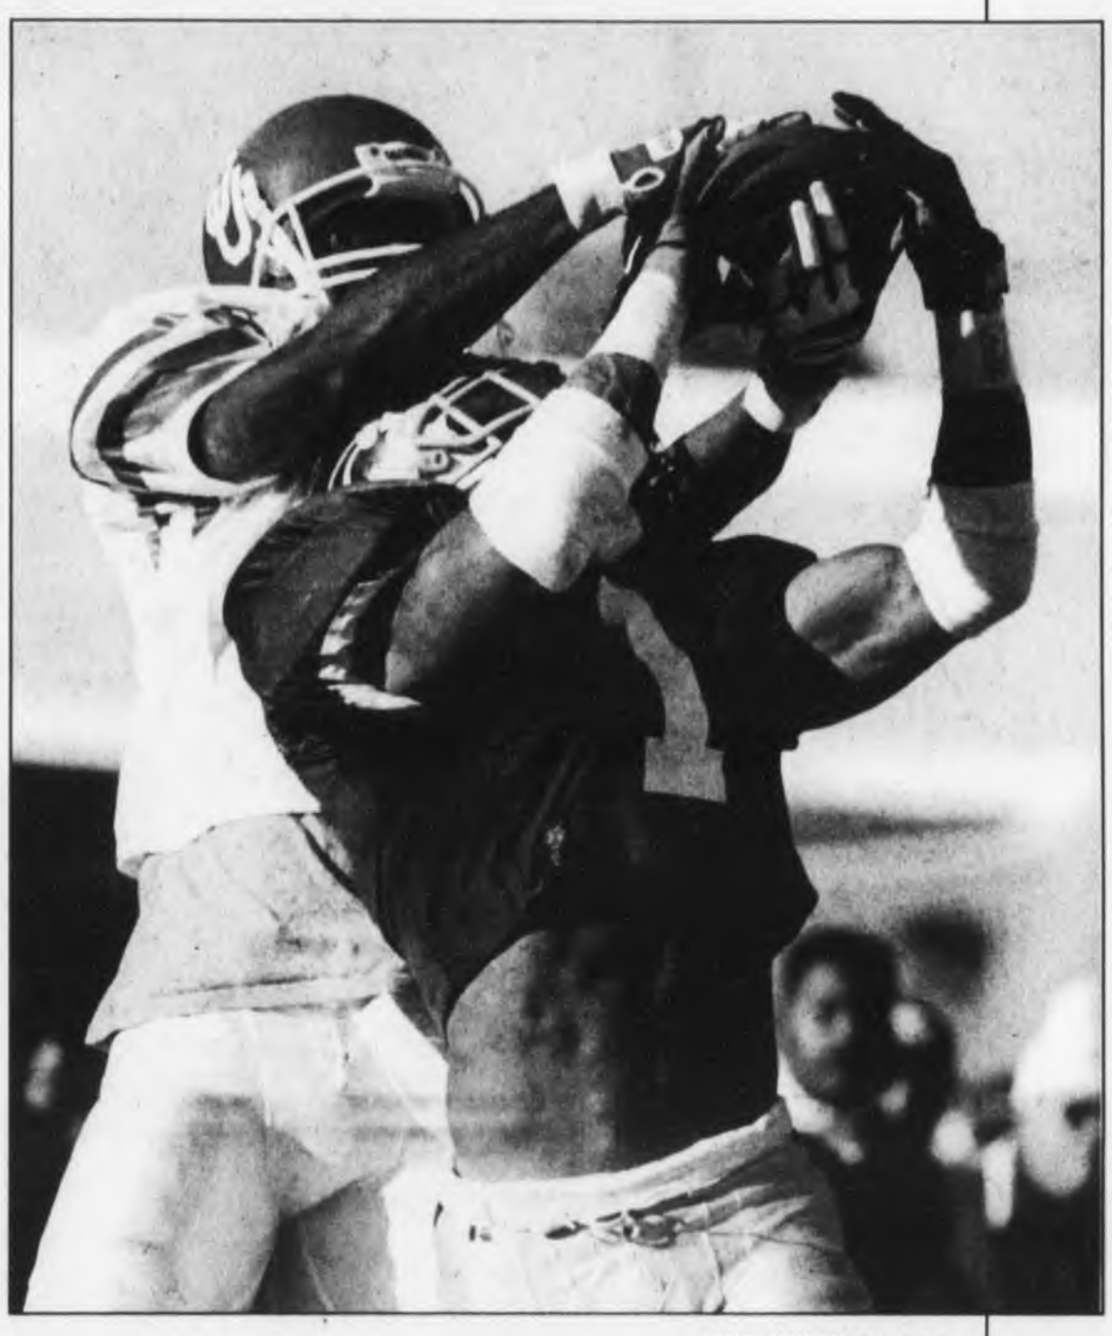
While the solution to Hickson's loss might be clear, the hole to fill is substantial.

The losses of Gordon and Hickson mean less tested players will be forced into the spotlight.

"It's a big loss," Smith said. "Younger players are going to have to step up."

Lawrence and Charles will now head the ground attack, but Gordon's loss in the secondary does not leave as clear a solution.

"We're not going to decide for a couple weeks," Snyder said. "We probably have six young guys that can step in and play."



At the top of that list, Snyder said, is junior Demetric Denmark.

Denmark, who was redshirted as a junior-college transfer last year, said the entire team must shoulder the burden of Gordon's loss.

"It's different without Gordon," Denmark said. "Everyone's got to step it up a notch."

Snyder listed freshman Lamar Chapman, senior Clyde Johnson and junior Monty Spiller as players who could also spell time in the defensive backfield.

Helping with the adjustment in the defensive backfield will be the veteran leadership of junior Chris Canty, a consensus first-team all-American last season, and senior Mario Smith. Smith is coming off Holiday Bowl defensive MVP honors.

Injury dampens fan day

With just 10 days remaining before Texas Tech University comes to Manhattan for the inaugural Big 12 Conference football game, K-State football fans were given a glimpse of the 1996 version of the Wildcats.

The occasion was the third annual Kansas State Football Fan Appreciation Day Wednesday evening at KSU Stadium's Wagner Field.

"This reminds us that we're not just playing for ourselves," wide receiver J.W. Wight said about the event. "As much support as they (the fans) give to us, we need to give support back to them."

The festivities began at 5 p.m. at the west parking lot of KSU Stadium, with the first 1,000 fans receiving hot dogs, T-shirts, magnets and posters.

The stadium gates were scheduled to be opened at 6 p.m. for fans to catch the remaining minutes of practice before Coach Bill Snyder and team captains spoke to the crowd.

Snyder gave permission to open the gates at 5:30, believing practice would end early. Unfortunately, the practice did not end early, and entering fans saw starting running back Eric Hickson carted off the field with a broken leg. Hickson will be out of action for the rest of the season.

The excitement concluded shortly after the injury, with fans being allowed to enter the playing field to gain autographs and mingle with Wildcat players.

"This makes us realize what we're a part of, what we need to do as people to keep up a good image and be good role models," offensive guard Jeremy Martin said. "It's good for kids to have role models as long as the role models hold up their end of the bargain."

Freshman linebacker Turelle Williams is quickly finding out what being looked up to as a college athlete is all about.

Congratulate, but beware; victory might not last long

Welcome back to the wide, wide world of K-State athletics — an ever-widening world.

To that end, welcome to K-State Jennifer Hale and the rest of the women's varsity crew coaching staff. The creature called Title IX has finally begun to reap rewards for women's sports.

You don't believe me? Look at how many women achieved gold-medal status during the recent Olympic extravaganza in Atlanta. Better yet, notice how many medals American, and I stress the word American, women reaped during the Games.

Tell me Title IX did not have anything to do with the impressive increase of precious metal in athletes' homes. I am not talking about Michael Johnson's jewelry.

Enough of that. Let me introduce myself. I am the sports editor, and I am responsible for anything that gets put on this page and, for that matter, anything that doesn't.

See the phone number at the top of the page? That's where you can reach me. Feel free to use that number any time you want to scream, yell, chat or offer news tips. Oh, yes — we always accept news tips. News is, of course, what you, the readers, live for.

MY

Shana NEWELL

And speaking of news, what we have tried to provide for you today is a review of important K-State sports news that has happened since the last time you opened the Collegian.

Of course the Olympics are an easy place to start. High-jumper Ed Broxterman and decathlete Steve Fritz competed in the Games, and Fritz almost won a gold medal. If you see them around, congratulate them. They represented our country and our campus well. K-Staters everywhere should be proud of the school's track and field program.

I am sure many of you are already getting itchy for Saturday's contest against the Texas Tech Red Raiders. Are you ready, K-State?

Coach Bill Snyder would probably say, "No, can I have four more weeks? I want Joe Gordon back in my secondary."

As many times as I have performed miracles, this is one time I can't. Hate to burst your purple bubble. I know Snyder and K-State faithfuls were just waiting for me to pull out my magic wand and mend Gordon's broken leg.

Although I can't bring back Joe any sooner than, oh, say, Nebraska, I can help K-Staters in their soul-deep passionate hatred of those jerk-birds down the highway. They are just Nebraska fans in disguise. When Nov. 9 gets here, they will be Wildcats in disguise.

Regardless if you hold a ticket to the game, get a group together, caravan to that awful city on the hill and show off purple pride in great numbers. You'll be able to get in after the second quarter, anyway. Brian Kavanagh and company will scare those Chickenhawk fans away after racking up a 45-0 score before halftime.

Before we look too far ahead, remember the yellow-bellied Raiders. Something tells me they are not too yellow-bellied. A lot of people, including yours truly, think this match-up is a little too close to call, especially now with cornerback Gordon, running back Eric Hickson and defensive end Darren Howard injured and backup quarterback Cody Lee Smith still fighting the food he ate last week.

Texas Tech is no Missouri. They are going to be tough competition with the likes of quarterback Zebbie Lethridge, running back Byron Hanspard and linebacker Robert Johnson. And face it, they're not exactly Temple, are they?

What's with that name — Zebbie? Can't blame the guy too much, it was his father's name. We could call him Little Zebbie.

Here's a message to all new Wildcats out there. Fan support in the past has been a little lax. This year's freshman class has a chance to try something new. How about supporting K-State, no matter the sport or the score, and showing a lot of purple pride.

Little Zebbie and his cream pies come to the Little Apple six days from today. Let's make them feel welcome. Bring your Little Zebbie cream pies and as much purple as you can next Saturday, and start off the inaugural season of the Big 12 Conference with a showing of Wildcat dominance.

With such an evenly matched game, the crowd might make the difference between a W or an L in the first-ever Big 12 Conference match-up for K-State.

Team preparing for fall season

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

The K-State baseball team is not waiting until spring to begin preparing for its new competition in what is projected to be one of the nation's toughest baseball conferences.

Wildcat assistant coach Rocky Ward said any student interested in walking onto the squad should attend an informational meeting today at 5 p.m. at Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

Walk-on tryouts will be Sept. 3-6 at 6:30 p.m. The tryouts will also be at Brandeberry.

Ward said although missing the informational meetings is strongly discouraged, students who were unable to attend may still try out.

The Wildcats finished fourth in the Big 8's final season with a 28-26 overall record, 11-18 in the Big 8. While some of those wins were against powerhouse teams like Oklahoma State

Bronze slips from Fritz's grasp

BRENT STOVER

It was simply a case of being so close yet so far away for American decathlete Steve Fritz at the centennial Olympic Games in Atlanta last month.

The former Wildcat standout and current K-State assistant track and field coach came up just short of a medal with a fourth-place finish in what is arguably the most grueling event in track and field.

But it wasn't missing out on a medal that bothers Fritz about his performance.

"You never want people to beat you that you feel shouldn't beat you," Fritz said. "I feel that a couple of people beat me that probably on normal occasions wouldn't, and that's why I'm upset with the place I got — not because I'm one place out of a medal."

The truth is that Fritz put together an amazing run in the second day of the two-day competition to put himself in position to medal.

The first day was a struggle for Fritz, who competed poorly in three out of the five events, landing him in 10th-place heading in to the second-half of competition. However, the five events on day two are always the strongest for Fritz.

"I knew I was going to make up ground on everybody. It was just a matter of how much ground I was able to make up and the number of people between me and the place I wanted to get," Fritz said. "I still thought I had a chance to medal and

Hamstring hampers Olympian

contributing writer

In the weeks preceding his Olympic experience, K-State high-jumper Ed Broxterman knew he could only envision Atlanta as being home for what would be the greatest show on earth.

Naturally, Broxterman became a little curious before he arrived in Atlanta. He pondered whether even the centennial Olympics could live up to a feat that great.

"You know how everybody will build up a movie and rave about how good it is, so you want to go see it," Broxterman said. "Only when you actually do, you expected so much from it, that you end up thinking an otherwise good movie wasn't so great."

That is what Broxterman said he thought might happen with all the hype surrounding the Olympics.

Instead, what he got was what he expected, with dessert.

"It was the experience of a lifetime, being among all of those countries and seeing all of the different cultures. I have lived my dream," Broxterman said.

Broxterman

Although the Games were everything Broxterman hoped they would be, his performance wasn't.

Failing to make opening height after his first attempt, Broxterman knew immediately he wasn't going to do much better.

Fighting a torn hamstring since before the Olympic Trials, Broxterman laid off his leg as much as possible before his performance in Atlanta.

"I knew after laying off for a month, my body would either feel great or it would feel bad," he said. "After I missed my first jump I knew it wasn't feeling good."

Broxterman wasn't the only Olympic hopeful from K-State who didn't go as far as might have been dreamed. High-jumper and 1992 alumna Connie Teaberry also failed to make opening height in her quest for an Olympic medal.

Although hopes may have been dampened, the experience cannot be taken away from either athlete.

"I did what I always dreamed about," Broxterman said. "Everything else is just icing on the cake now."

Coach misses decathlon medal

Steve Fritz finished fourth in the 1996 Olympic decathlon with 8,644 points. Dan O'Brien won the event with 8,824 points.

Vikings cut former Cat

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Former K-State quarterback Chad May was cut Sunday by the Minnesota Vikings as the NFL franchise lowered its roster to the 53-player limit.

Last year's third-string quarterback, Chad May completed only six of 12 passes during the Vikings' 1996 preseason.

May threw for 50 yards, averaging 2.92 yards per attempt, his longest a 13-yarder. He threw three interceptions and had one sack.

A 1995 fourth-round draft pick by the Vikings, May is second on K-State's career passing list with 5,253 yards. He ranks behind Lynn Dickey ,who played for the Wildcats from 1968-70.

May is also first and second on the single-season passing list with 2,682 and 2,571 yards, respectively.

May's release gave the third-string job to Jay Walker, a former New England Patriot who also played with the Barcelona Dragons of the World League.

'96-'97 team adds height

JOHN BERGGREN

In the middle of one of the more interesting offseasons in recent K-State basketball history, basketball coach Tom Asbury has to hope things stay somewhat dull.

Last year's preseason freshman phenom Manny Dies asked for a release from his scholarship in mid-June, but Athletic Director Max Urick and Asbury refused to grant Dies the release.

Dies, a Wichita native, stated the reason he wanted a release was homesickness.

"You never know with these young guys," Asbury said at the time of Dies' request. "He indicated that he wanted to be closer to home, and he really didn't give any reason except for he didn't like Manhattan."

In mid-July, Asbury announced that Dies had changed his mind and that he would resume his academic and athletic career this fall at K-State.

K-State fans will see an unfamiliar look on the court this fall. The Cats will come into this season with the biggest team in K-State history.

Asbury has added some height in Dax Jones, a 7'0" transfer from Cloud County Community College, and Joe Leonard, a 7'1" high-school graduate out of St. Louis.

"Dax is a guy who has already used his redshirt, so he has to play this year," Asbury said. "Joe is only 225 pounds on a 7'1" frame, and he's going to be a great player."

Patterson rounds out staff

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Coach Debbie Patterson rounded out her coaching staff this summer, adding Sue Serafini to the final spot.

Serafini spent the last six seasons at the University of Scranton, Penn., serving as an assistant for five years and interim coach during the 1994-95 season. Scranton played in the NCAA Division III Tournament all six years.

Converse named Serafini NCAA Division III Region 4 Coach of the Year in 1995, when she was the interim coach.

While the Wildcats added a coach, they lost four players over the summer.

Point guards Amanda Chamberlain, a two-year starter, and Alli Chonko have both decided to transfer.

Chamberlain will play at University of Missouri-Kansas City, while Chonko will play at Rockhurst College.

Forwards Carrie Ragar and Kari Willingham have also left the team and will not return to K-State. At this time neither has announced plans to play elsewhere.

City needs coaching volunteers

■ College students make good coaches for youth activities like football.

DAVE GUNTHER
contributing writer

The Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department is looking for volunteer coaches for soccer, flag-football and volleyball for this fall.

Mike Buchanan, MPRD supervisor, said he needs people interested in devoting between four and six hours per week to coach Manhattan's youth.

While there is no minimum age to coach, those interested should have an interest in and some knowledge about the sport.

"Basically, it is a chance for one to give something back to the sport," Buchanan said.

"It gives people a chance to do volunteer work for their community, which always looks good on a resume, not to mention that they will gain experience working with kids."

COACH'S

▶ For more information about coaching, contact Mike Buchanan at the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department at 587-2757.

Coaching entails a recommended two practices and one game each week. The outdoor games will be at Frank Anneberg Park, and practice schedules are set by the coaches.

Indoor sports also have one game per week. The season spans 10 weeks, with eight games being held before the season ends in early November.

"All the coaches have to do is coach," Buchanan said. "Team selection will be done by Parks and Rec, and we provide sponsors and team uniforms. We have plenty of spots available, and we are hoping to get them all filled."

Pat Ryan, Manhattan resident, coached baseball for MPRD this summer.

Ryan said he had a blast coaching the kids.

"It was great to see the kids develop their skills as the season progresses," he said. "Watching the kids having fun and taking something they weren't sure of and becoming confident and enjoying it was a real reward.

"It is a great feeling for the kids' parents to come up to you at the end of the season and thank you for helping out with their kid," Ryan said.

Construction countdown: Everything should be ready

■ Workers have been busy to make sure work is done by the Aug. 31 deadline.

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

Skepticism about whether construction at KSU Stadium will be finished before the inaugural Big 12 football game Saturday is ending.

All of the main projects are expected to wrap up this week.

Among the new looks at the stadium is a new learning center added onto the north side of the Vanier Football Complex. The concourse around the stadium was widened, and more concessions have been added.

Two new scoreboards were added at the south end of the stadium, and where the old scoreboard once stood at the north end of the stadium, a JumboTron big-screen television will now take its place.

"The JumboTron is up," said Kent Brown, K-State sports information director.

"Ads are being put in place, and all the television's hardware is in place. Now work is being done to get it all up and running."

Bramlage Coliseum Facilities Director Charlie Thomas said fans will find appreciation for the changes.

"With the widened concourse around the stadium and new scoreboards and JumboTron, we think it will create a new, even more exciting atmosphere for the fans," he said.

With all the projects going on around the stadium this summer, people passing by might have been doubtful as to whether the construction would be completed. But Thomas said there is no need to worry.

"We've had a lot of projects going on all at once," Thomas said. "The weather didn't affect it too much. We had to wait on some shipment orders, but nothing out of the ordinary. We see the end and sigh."

But not the end of everything. Certain aspects of the Academic Learning Center, like landscaping, may not be complete by the inaugural Big 12 game.

Thomas said there have been a lot of changes around the football stadium since he took his position as Facilities Director.

"I've been in my position for a little over a year now, and the changes have been tremendous," Thomas said. "It's a real tribute to our program, and if we didn't have Coach Snyder we wouldn't be where we are now."

look up to you, there's added pressure," Williams said.

For one young fan, the opportunity to visit with all-Big 8 wide receiver Kevin Lockett provided the biggest thrill.

"He's really nice and makes a lot of good catches," said Ryan Seematter, a 14-year-old from Manhattan.

An estimated 5,000 fans attended the event.

"The fans have really been there for us."

The popularity of K-State football is at an all-time high after three consecutive bowl appearances, including a 54-21 drubbing of Colorado State in last year's Holiday Bowl.

But the Cats still traveled to Oklahoma City at the end of the season to compete in the Big 8 Tournament. Two straight losses found K-State quickly returning to Manhattan.

Right-handed pitchers David Johnson and Matt Koeman were picked in this summer's major-league baseball draft.

The Minnesota Twins picked Johnson in the 29th round. The second-team all-Big 8 pick was 1-1 with six saves for the Cats in 1996.

He struck out 23 hitters in 20.1 innings of work. Johnson was a third-year sophomore who sat out the 1995 season with elbow trouble.

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said Johnson will be returning to the Wildcats' squad instead of turning professional.

Koeman, a senior, went to the Cleveland Indians in the 30th round. The staff ace last season, Koeman led K-State in wins, innings pitched and strikeouts, and earned first-team all-Big 8 honors for the second consecutive year.

Koeman

Koeman signed with the Indians and joined their Rookie Class A team in Burlington. He posted a 5-2 record before returning to K-State this fall in order not to lose his academic scholarship.

FRITZ

even win if I could get on a good enough roll early and get some breaks here and there."

Fritz gained so much ground on the field of competitors that after nine events he found himself in third place. With only a 25-point lead, little room remained for error in the final event — the 1,500-meter run.

Fritz was all but out of gas after the second to last event, the pole vault, taking him 16 jumps to get the mark that he wanted.

It usually takes decathletes eight to 10 jumps in the vault. Fritz seemingly completed two events in one, making him all the more exhausted heading into the final event.

Fritz ran a time of 4:38 in the 1,500-meter. However, it was only good enough for fourth, a place some consider to be the toughest to swallow.

"If your whole goal is winning medals and glory and all of that type of stuff, then fourth place is probably a terrible spot. But if you're out there competing and doing the best you can do, regardless of what place you get, then the place is irrelevant," Fritz said.

Fritz

Fritz enjoyed the opportunity to compete in the United States, as most major track and field meets take place in Europe.

It gave his family an opportunity to watch him compete. It also helped to have the backing of the majority of the fans in Olympic Stadium.

"The crowd was very good from start to finish," Fritz said. "Because I was struggling a lot the first day, they kept picking me up and getting me back into it."

Fritz, a native of Gypsum, began his decathlon career at Hutchinson Community College in 1987, even though he had never even competed in half of the 10 events involved.

The main reason Fritz went to Hutchinson was to play basketball, but he thought he'd try his hand at decathlons during the spring — a decision which paid off immensely.

In 1988, Fritz won the decathlon at the 1988 NJCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships.

He also hit the game-winning basket for Hutchinson in the NJCAA Basketball Championship that same year.

Fritz continued his basketball career at K-State and was a two-time all-American in the decathlon for the Wildcats.

This year will mark his fifth year as part of the Wildcat coaching staff.

It also marks the fifth year of full-time decathlon training for Fritz, who feels that he has yet to reach his potential as a decathlete.

"I'm just now figuring out what I should be doing," Fritz said.

"I'm still having a lot of bad events and not putting everything together."

Considering that Fritz is already the fourth-best decathlete in the world, when he does put it all together, he could find himself at the top.

▸ GREEK 101

Course teaches greeks responsibility

DAN LEWERENZ
assistant campus editor

For most students, classes begin this morning. But last night new members of K-State's Greek community sat in on a session of Greek 101.

Taught by Bernard Franklin, vice president of the National Center for Fathering and former assistant dean of student life at K-State, Greek 101 was a seminar on greek life at K-State.

The good, the bad, the ugly — Franklin left no subject untouched in an attempt to educate new greeks about the tradition they are inheriting.

"You are here to get an education," Franklin said. "And there's no organization on campus that's going to help you more than your fraternity or sorority."

Many students arrive on campus never having needed to study, Franklin said, and will be unfamiliar with study hours every night. The temptation will be there to go out with friends instead of studying.

"There will come a time when you have to make a decision," he said. "Do what you need to do."

Franklin then urged those present to look at their neighbors and recognize them as future colleagues — and as people, not objects. He addressed the stereotype of greeks as partiers and said such an attitude can lead to trouble.

His imitation of an inebriated woman at a party had the crowd laughing, but his talk soon changed to a more somber tone.

"It's funny, I know it is. But I don't have the time to tell you all the stories of the women who woke up sore in parts of the bodies, and they know what happened. Some of them are pregnant," he said.

> "This is one of the finest Greek communities in the country. But it could all end tonight..."
> • BERNARD FRANKLIN
> FORMER ASSISTANT DEAN OF STUDENT LIFE

"One in five women will be raped. One in three will be victims of a sexual assault. Fifty percent will face some sort of sexual misconduct or assault. That's not people — that's objects."

Franklin said that by focusing on the positive aspects of greek life, today's members can maintain a system that has produced the majority of America's business, political and educational leaders.

"This is one of the finest greek communities in the country. But it could all end tonight with one hazing incident. It can all stop tonight with one rape. It can all stop tonight if one house makes T-shirts with African Americans splashed across it."

Students responded positively to what Franklin had to say.

"It was motivating," Jeremy Robl, freshman in political science, said. "For a beginning point it was a good way to start the year."

Tracy Schoepflin, freshman in accounting, said Franklin's discussion of men's and women's responsibilities was particularly enlightening.

"It was pretty informative," she said. "I think he said a lot of good things about rape and sexual issues. I hope that lesson got through to the guys in the audience."

swells; now trampling by in ponderous columns."

Various pioneers wrote of riding past grazing herds that stretched hundreds of miles.

But by the late 1870s, even the western herds were gone, hunted down for their hides.

A bison herd finally returned to Manhattan in 1987 when the Konza Prairie obtained 36 of the animals from Fort Riley.

Now numbering 210, the herd roams freely across 2,500 of the Konza's 8,600 acres.

"One of our primary missions is to study how the tall grass ecosystem works," said David Hartnett, director of the Konza, which is owned by the Nature Conservancy and administered by K-State.

"We know that grazing plays a major role in maintaining the system, so now we're asking: What were the ecological consequences of the buffalo's disappearance? And what effect did the introduction of cattle have?"

Because the Konza bison are part of a controlled study, they are not fed or cared for during most of the year.

"We don't do anything to them out here," Van Slyke said as he climbed back into the Jeep.

"They graze where they want, water in the valley streams and do their thing."

RUSHEES TESSA Wendling, Halstead; Megan Meeker, Wellington; and Amber Magee, Junction City, attempt to sing along with Rush counselors during Rush orientation. Rushees were taught one song from each house.

STUDENTS PARTICIPATING in Rush wait outside the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority house. This was the first round of open-house parties, during which the rushees met women in each of the houses and toured the houses for the first time.

It's part of the collective psyche of every sorority member, from not knowing what to say at the first open-house party to the anticipation of Bid Day.

It's Rush, and it's one of college's most pivotal periods for hundreds of women each year.

But it begins long before the bid cards are delivered, long before the house tours begin, long before the first freshman arrives.

PREPARATION

Sunday, Aug. 11 — It began at 1 p.m. Each of K-State's 11 sororities, whose members had already come back to prepare, was given copies of the master list of rushees. Chapter officers, Rush counselors and Panhellenic Council representatives gathered to begin to prepare for the coming week.

At 9 a.m. the next day, the preparation began in earnest.

Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs, and Rush coordinators Jamie Dickson, senior in architectural engineering, and Kim Diskin, senior in communication science disorders, reviewed the basics: who counts as a legacy, how many invitations rushees should accept, etc.

> "If you spill a drink in a girl's lap, or if your leg falls asleep ... it's all right. There are no mistakes."
> • KIM DISKIN
> RUSH COORDINATOR

With each point on the agenda came a stack of papers — lists of rushees, open-house groups, floor meeting agendas, residence-hall rules, Rush rules.

"I feel like I'm already behind," said a soft voice from across the room.

That afternoon the Rush counselors reconvened at the Alpha Chi Omega sorority house for their first house tour. By the end of the afternoon, they had been through all 11 houses.

Although the Rush counselors were not responsible for giving tours to rushees, they did need to know the basics about each house.

Mary Ellen Nass, senior in advertising, said most of the counselors already knew something about each house, but the tours served as a refresher.

"I think almost everyone has friends in most of the houses," Nass said. "This just helps us get acquainted with what's new and who has what types of facilities."

And while the Rush counselors didn't give tours, they knew they would be bombarded with questions.

"With so many things to remember, they'll have lots of questions," Nancy Rinella, senior in elementary education, said. "Just anything the girls need to know — sleeping dorms versus beds in the rooms, telephones in the room."

Preparation continued all that day and into the next. Tuesday night, the counselors moved into their rooms in Haymaker and Moore halls and started getting the buildings ready.

More than 500 rushees would arrive the next day.

ORIENTATION

They began to arrive around noon Wednesday — 503 freshmen, sophomores and juniors who would spend the next five days in a whirlwind of parties and engagements, trying to determine which house best matched their personalities.

But the new arrivals weren't the only ones showing little signs of nerves. The Rush counselors, who were not allowed to reveal what house they belonged to, had spent the last several days making sure they'd left their letters behind, combing through their clothes and covering up stickers on their cars.

"I had gone through everything before I came down here — shorts, T-shirts, everything," Rinella told the counselors on her floor as the last rushees trickled in.

"Then last night I'm walking to the shower and someone pointed to my shower caddy. And there it was, Gamma Phi Beta splashed right across it."

At 4:30 p.m., everyone gathered in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union for orientation. Dickson and Diskin let the rushees know what was ahead and tried to allay their fears.

"If you spill a drink in a girl's lap, or if your leg falls asleep and you have to start shaking it while you're talking to someone, it's all right," Diskin said. "There are no mistakes."

In what almost seemed like a planned faux pas, Diskin fumbled the microphone when returning it to the podium.

"See," she said, "we're all going to make mistakes."

INVITATION

The next five days were dizzying beyond belief. Rushees visited all 11 houses Wednesday evening and Thursday, selecting which houses they would like to revisit Friday night. Each chapter also submitted a list of invitations for rushees to return.

"I was looking for the friendliness of the girls and how they interacted with each other," Keri Dougherty, freshman in apparel marketing, said of the early parties.

Friday rushees attended as many as eight house-tour parties, another opportunity to learn about individual

LORI WINTER, freshman in pre-occupational therapy, hugs Pam Williams, freshman undecided, while Julie Grunewald, freshman in education, watches. Bids for new members had just been extended, and the women had just found out what houses they would be joining.

JENNIFER GORMAN, junior in biology, and Kori Keeton, senior in political science, take a moment to relax outside Haymaker Hall after Rush is completed. Gorman is the public relations director for Panhellenic Council, and Keeton is the president of Panhellenic Council.

Students help communities

MATT BASLER
staff reporter

Every summer, student teams travel to different places in the world as well as around Kansas to educate and assist smaller communities in various activities.

The teams, a part of the K-State Community Service Program recently sponsored a seminar, at which members spoke about their experiences in Kansas and abroad.

> "It's a wonderful opportunity to appreciate completely different lifestyles while gaining real-world experience."
> • VICKIE CLEMENTS
> SENIOR IN FAMILY STUDIES AND HUMAN SERVICES

Students in the program assist communities with education, horticulture, environmental awareness, new technology, media relations and building repair.

The teams are made up of three to four K-State students who are chosen for their cultural awareness and ability to handle difficult situations. These students come back to K-State with a better understanding about community service and the rewards it has to offer.

CSP wants to give students a chance to get involved in community service. It held the seminar to educate students and encourage them to get more involved in campus organizations.

Kim Ebben, junior in social work and coordinator for the Kansas teams, provided the introductory speech.

"We have such an opportunity to influence kids who haven't had a positive influence in their lives," Ebben said. "I probably learned more in one summer than I have in my two years of college."

Members told stories of how they helped people and how the experience affected them personally. The seminar included presentations, visual displays and a reception to inform students about the wide range of possibilities in CSP.

The organization offers three credit hours for the international teams and one hour for Kansas teams. While Kansas team members receive a stipend for their time, international team members gain experience. Students interested in the international teams are selected in November for the following summer.

Founded in 1987, CSP strives to build educational partnerships with communities, both domestically and internationally.

"It's a wonderful opportunity to appreciate a completely different lifestyle while gaining real-world experience," Vickie Clements, senior in family studies and human services, said.

Clements participated in a CSP project in Glasco, working on street preservation.

"It was the best experience I ever had," Rabiha Abuzeineh, junior in elementary education, said. Abuzeineh is the international teams coordinator for CSP.

CSP encourages new students to step up and take the challenge. Each semester, certain courses are offered for students returning from these trips in order to reflect upon their experiences. Without these courses, information and advice could be lost or overlooked. Students receive scholarships to help them pay for trips.

"We try to help them get aid to go on our trips. We try to help facilitate that," Abuzeineh said.

Carol Peak, director of CSP, said the organization operates on funds provided by donations and scholarships contributed by the deans of colleges.

"This is a special group of people," Peak said. "I don't think any of us dreamed that 10 years later we would be talking to you."

Lafene's budget cuts force changes in program funding

KENNY WENTWORTH
staff writer

Saving money is quickly becoming a common goal for University-supported services. Lafene Health Center is no exception.

With less money, the health center faces the challenge of not only satisfying students, but satisfying them with a lower budget.

Last semester, 97 percent of Lafene's patients were content with the health center's services, but it has yet to be determined how cutbacks in services this semester will affect student responses.

"This is my sixth year here, and every year I've been able to utilize the services provided. Hopefully the money crunch they are in won't affect the center too much. If it does, I guess we just have to live with it," Shawn Martin, graduate student in marriage and family therapy, said.

The denial of an increase in student fees for Lafene last semester will have an immediate impact on students, Lafene director Lannie Zweimiller said.

"With cutbacks in funding, Lafene will have to limit its hours even further by not taking appointments after 6:30 p.m.," Zweimiller said. "We also are not able to fill a vacant physician's position due to the cutbacks."

The proposed increase would have set the fee at $90-100 per student. That increase was voted down by Student Senate last spring. Now the health center must find a way to run on the funds it does have, he said.

"With the new way of figuring fees, every student is estimated at paying around $83 for the student health fee. That puts us in a conservative position with our money. We just have to see how things go before we can rehire," Zweimiller said.

The one main concern students expressed in the survey was inconvenient parking. Fewer spaces have been available due to uncontrollable circumstances, such as the library's construction.

"We are trying to get more metered spots. People that just need to run in and pick up a prescription or pay a bill end up having to walk across campus just to get here. With a few more spots, that can be fixed," Zweimiller said.

Local scene rich, diversified

I hate trying to decide what to do on a Friday night.

If you're like me, most of your entertainment budget comes from scrounging around for change in the backseat of your car and looking underneath the cushions of your couch.

Perhaps one of the silliest questions I've ever heard is "Isn't there anything to do in Manhattan?"

Of course.

You just have to know where to look.

Streetside Music offers free live concerts in the afternoons and evenings both at Triangle Park and in the Streetside Records store.

DJ Smoov will play reggae at 3:30 p.m. Tuesday in Triangle Park, across the street from Varney's Book Store.

Shawn Mullins, an opener for the Indigo Girls and Matthew Sweet, will also play at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday in Triangle Park .

If you're a line-dancer or if you enjoy live country music, Kickers Saloon and Grille features local musicians, such as New West and Brushfire on Friday and Saturday nights.

If you like spicy Mexican food with your country music, check out Raoul's Escondido on Wednesday nights.

This Wednesday night, Raoul's will feature country singer Mark Hank Monroe from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m.

For a quieter evening, start out at the K-State Student Union Art Gallery. The gallery closes at 5 p.m. every night, but it's a romantic start for a first date.

Try different variations. Other local galleries include Strecker Gallery and Willard Gallery.

Beginning August 26, Willard Gallery will feature the works of Martha Horvay, a former K-State instructor of art.

After the gallery, you can walk over to Java or Espresso Royale for some coffee and pastries, or even a light dinner.

Espresso is nice because you can stay as long as you like and enjoy the art, the atmosphere and sometimes the live music.

If you've got the back-to-school blues, try a movie for a pick-me-up.

Manhattan has five movie theaters. Westloop Theatre and Seth Child Cinema feature first-run movies.

The Campus Theatre in Aggieville is better for a low-budget evening of entertainment, and you can catch a movie you missed the first time.

Likewise, Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union also shows second-run movies at student-friendly prices, sponsored by the Union Program Council.

The first UPC Feature Film will be "The Birdcage" at 7 and 9:30 p.m. August 30, and 7 p.m. August 31.

With the reopening of the Varsity Theatre, you can also enjoy art-oriented films, such as "Sense and Sensibility."

While McCain Auditorium events are usually more expensive than movie tickets, they're always worth it.

This fall, upcoming McCain events include "The Bible" by the Reduced Shakespeare Theater and "Pirates! The Ballet" performed by the Queensland Ballet.

If you're looking for local stars, check out the K-State Theatre. K-State Theatre will present its summer production of "The Foreigner" September 3-7 in Nichols Theatre.

From local artists to nationally acclaimed productions, Manhattan offers students rich, diversified entertainment. Friday nights don't have to be hard to plan after all.

Varsity Theatre reopens for fall

ABBI HAKE
staff writer

After a six-week hiatus, due to air-conditioning problems, the Varsity Theater in Aggieville turned on its projectors Aug. 23 just in time to entertain the returning K-State crowd.

Varsity Theater, 1125 Moro, closed down July 11 after one of the two air-conditioning units failed.

Bob Howard, city manager of Manhattan theaters, said one unit would not cool the building properly and the problem was too serious and expensive to fix.

Consequently, they were forced to close the theater until cooler weather prevailed.

"We can't do enough business to replace it," Howard said.

Jamie Pride, manager of the Campus and Varsity theaters, said there was some inquiry over the summer from customers as to why the theater closed.

"We've had a lot of people asking about it," Pride said.

Pride said he was unsure about whether the theater will remain open next summer.

"We don't know what we're doing next year for sure. We're playing it by ear," Pride said.

Pride said the Varsity Theater will continue its policy of showing art films.

The theater reopened with "Stealing Beauty," a film about an American girl on vacation in Italy who discovers her first love.

"We're trying to continue on with the same idea," Pride said.

Some of the films being featured throughout the rest of August and September include "Dead Man," "Last Summer in the Hamptons," "Welcome to the Doll House," "Cold Comfort Farm" and "Lone Star."

BILL MESHANE, lead singer of Ultimate Fake Book, jams Friday afternoon in front of Van Zile Hall.

Ultimate Fake Book revamps sound

live. music REVIEW

The Manhattan band Ultimate Fake Book established its new sound Friday at a concert outside Strong Complex.

Ultimate Fake Book was one of four bands that played Friday to raise money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. The shelter helps people for a variety of reasons.

Some people there have had a financial crisis, while some have had emotional or personal crises. Some are homeless people trying to travel to another community. But audience members familiar with Ultimate Fake Book might have noticed a new sound from the band.

Bill McShane, singer and guitarist, said the band used to have another singer.

"He sang a lot differently. He did a lot of screaming and yelling," McShane said. "It was really noisy."

Nick Bock, freshman in architecture, said he liked McShane's vocals.

Ultimate Fake Book now sounds less noisy and more melodic. McShane said the change was not planned. It was a natural transition for the band.

He said the former singer left the band because he got married and now has a son. Ultimate Fake Book has released one tape. McShane said because the band made the tape before its sound changed, it does not sell them anymore.

He said the band plans to release a recording this winter.

Another Manhattan band and two Kansas City, Mo., bands also played. Dustin Springer, senior in elementary education and president of Van Zile Hall, organized the event. Admission was $1 or donated soap, deodorant or food.

"Manhattan does so much for the University. I think we need to give a little back," Springer said.

Another Manhattan band, Ruskabank, played after Ultimate Fake Book.

Ruskabank is a seven-piece ska band.

The band members looked bored until their last two songs, when they started to relax.

The band had been trying to convince people to pay or donate to get inside the temporary orange fence.

"The grass is greener on this side," Jayson Sullivan, bassist and sophomore in marketing, said.

During the seventh song, keyboard player Donnyves Laroque, sophomore in music, came down from the stage and danced around with the audience. About eight people were at the front dancing.

Eva Funderburgh, Eisenhower Middle School student and one of the dancers, said, "I'm a big fan of Ruskabank. They played their first concert in our basement."

Ruskabank's singer and guitarist David Spiker, junior in biology secondary education, works for Funderburgh's father.

Her father, James Funderburgh, is a research associate professor of biology.

Spiker said the band played its first concert in the Funderburghs' basement in March.

Springer said all the bands were cooperative. He paid them with pizza and gave the two Kansas City bands $30 each for gas money. One Kansas City band, Mop, was supposed to go on at 6:15 p.m. The band members got lost and did not arrive until 7:30 p.m.

"It's my fault. I drove to Emporia and then almost to Wichita," Jon George, Mop's singer, said.

When Mop arrived, Pamper the Madman, also from Kansas City, had started playing. Pamper the Madman's singer, Theresa Schloegel, stole the stage from her bandmates. She enjoyed performing and had no inhibitions.

Female singers are rare in regional bands, and it was refreshing to see one who was such an engaging performer.

Museum almost ready

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Nearly six months behind its original schedule, yet on budget, the new Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will open its doors to the public in mid-October.

Nelson Britt, director of the Beach museum, said the ribbon-cutting and official opening to the public is set for 1:30 p.m. Oct. 13.

Britt and the rest of the museum staff are split between two offices. Britt works mostly out of the new offices in the ground level of the museum. The rest of the staff — curator Bill North and education coordinator Kathrine Walker — have been working out of the museum's offices in the Foundation Center for the past several years, about one mile west of the museum on Anderson Avenue.

BEACH Museum of Art

"We're moving in phases," Britt said. "The gallery managers are here working out of one of the offices."

Britt said he was working at the museum because there are numerous details and decisions pertaining to the building itself that must be worked out between the contractor and the subcontractors.

"There's no reason to make trips all day down Anderson," Britt said.

He said from now until the opening, there will always be museum staff in the building — especially since a variety of people stop by unexpectedly to see the museum and to speak with him.

The architect of the museum, Arthur Andersson, visited the museum last Wednesday and was impressed with what he saw, Britt said.

The Beach museum was made possible by a gift of $3 million by Ross and Marianna Beach of Hays, both K-State graduates. Ross Beach gave the gift on behalf of Marianna Beach for their anniversary. Britt said the total cost of the building is $6 million-plus, which is on budget. He said the contingency fund was also spent, but 80 percent of the fund went for the betterment of the building and not for fixing mistakes.

"It's been a very smooth process," Britt said, "but very slow."

Britt said he thinks the University will take possession of the building Sept. 5. By that time, the building's interior, which is still a bit of a work in progress, will be finished, cleaned and ready for the staff to begin the installation of the art in the gallery spaces.

However, Britt said he thinks it will take at least eight to 10 months before the building will function as smoothly as the staff expects. There are already works of art being housed in the temporary storage spaces in the ground-level vault of the museum.

Britt said the main priority for the museum staff is getting the storage facilities up to snuff so work can begin as soon as possible on hanging the exhibits. Most of the work in the storage areas, or vault, of the museum is being done by the staff, he said. The planned cafe, which will be operated by K-State's food services, and a bookstore, operated by the K-State Union Bookstore, will also open with the museum. It will be a few weeks before the books hit the shelves, because the interior remains the most important priority to be completed.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect, said overall the building is 98 percent to 99 percent done. Before the art collection can be permanently installed, the building's air must be brought to a satisfactory level of comfort and safety.

Carter said the building must be dried out to reduce the moisture content of the air, because much of the concrete work in the building still contains moisture. He said the building is performing well and has been stabilizing on its own.

The Beach museum, on the extreme southeast corner of campus, will house the K-State art collection. The collection has been in storage at the Foundation Center and hanging in various campus offices for decades while funds were being raised to build a museum.

NEW Evening College

Fall 1996 Evening College Courses
Kansas State University
Evening College has been added to the K-State After Hours program. Evening College/After Hours offers classes on campus at 4:30 p.m. or later, and includes courses that meet requirements for several undergraduate and graduate degrees. Evening College will offer courses, generally between 6:00 p.m. and 10:00 p.m., that are required in most degree programs and that have high enrollments during daytime hours. A popular feature of many evening college courses will be their 8-week schedule which will allow students to complete courses in half the time of the traditional semester courses. Students enrolled in Evening College/After Hours can continue their education while working full-time and meeting family obligations, improving and gaining skills which will enable them to do better on the job or move into a more rewarding position.

Students still have options to vote

MYLISSIA BLANKENSHIP
staff reporter

Students who did not take advantage of the voter-registration table during enrollment and fee payment may still register in the November elections.

Marilyn Oertle of the Riley County clerk's office said the deadline to register is Oct. 21.

In order to register to vote, a person must reside in Riley County at least 14 days before the election.

Aaron Otto, student body vice president, said the Student Government Association and the League of Women Voters is planning a registration drive.

They will be mailing voter-registration cards to K-State students and planning several other activities and events associated with this year's election.

"Registering and voting is easier than it has ever been," said Otto. "We hope to register more students than ever this year. In the last presidential election, only 25 percent of K-State students voted on campus."

Voters who registered previously in other counties may transfer their registration to Riley County by filling out a form in the county clerk's office or by completing a change-of-address card at the driver's license office.

Oertle said voters who have registered to vote in Riley County before but now live at a different address may go to the booth designated for their new address and fill out a form on election day.

New voters who have not previously registered may register at the county clerk's office, the driver's license office or the public library. Several Manhattan banks also offer voter registration.

Karen Tryphonas, who works in the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union, said that students may register at OSAS.

Students may register to vote in Riley County or in the county they come from. If they register for another county, however, they will have to travel back there to vote or vote by mail.

Voters have more options this year than they have had in the past. Advance voting has replaced absentee voting.

Trisha Champlin of the Riley County clerk's office said new laws require the county clerk to make ballots available at least seven days before the election for voters who wish to cast their ballots in advance. The clerk has the option of allowing advance voting up to 20 days before the election. Voters may stop by the clerk's office and cast their ballot.

Voting by mail is possible. Registered voters can call and request an application for a mail-in ballot until Nov. 1, but it is not a good idea to wait that long.

"People that wait until the last day to request a mail-in ballot are really taking a chance," said Champlin. "All ballots must be in on election day, or they won't be counted."

Student artwork collects awards during Chang Gallery exhibition

senior staff writer

A collection of interesting design projects from the College of Architecture and Design spent its summer vacation in Seaton Hall's Chang Gallery.

Diane Potts, director of business and administrative services for the College of Architecture and Design, said the exhibition features work chosen by college faculty as being the most exceptional among the graduating seniors.

The Chang itself houses the nominated and winning projects from the 1996 Heintzelman Prize, while the display boards across the hall from the gallery feature landscape and interior architecture projects. The work will be on exhibit until Aug. 30.

The Heintzelman Prize is an annual competition of outstanding design achievements by students in the final semester of the professional bachelor of architecture degree program. The prize is named after J. Cranston Heintzelman, who taught in the Department of Architecture.

The six students nominated were Dwayne Oyler, Michael Stornello, Jeffrey Schutzler, Kurt Schultz, Yoonhie Lee and Chris Metz. Lee was chosen as the winner for her "Edward Hopper Collection and Library of American Realism."

If anything, Lee's winning entry harks back to a pre-World War II modernism of Le Corbusier which, although it occurred during Hopper's prodigious period, was never fully reflected in his work.

The prize is awarded by a jury of three. This year's jury included Jonathan Kemper, chairman of the Commerce Bank in Kansas City, Mo.; W. Cecil Steward, FAIA and dean of the College of Architecture at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln; and Manhattan's own Julie Strecker, owner of the Strecker Gallery downtown.

Evening college courses provide closed-class relief

KENNY WENTWORTH
staff reporter

The most dreaded list on campus is often the closed-class list. Starting this semester, evening college, an alternative time period for introductory-level classes that fill quickly, is available.

The program will give students the opportunity to take up to 15 different courses at night.

Because many introductory-level courses are often full, more of these classes were needed, Dave Stewart, assistant dean of continuing education, said.

"We had on-campus students having to go off campus to take courses, because they were full here. They should not have to do that and hopefully won't, since evening college is now available," Stewart said.

Another group that will benefit from evening college is non-traditional students, Stewart said. Because many of them often have other obligations during the day with children or jobs, evening is the only available time.

"Students enrolled in evening college courses can continue their education while working full-time and meeting family obligations. Students can gain new skills which will enable them to do better on the job or to move into a more rewarding position," Stewart said.

The courses that will be offered cover a wide range of introductory-level subjects, including Spanish, history, chemistry and college algebra.

The classes will meet on Tuesdays and Thursdays and will last three hours. They will be taught on an eight-week program, Stewart said.

"This is another aspect that might attract students to the program. You will have to sit in class the same amount of hours, but it lasts just eight weeks," he said.

The future of the program is not certain, but the program could grow if there is ample response, Stewart said.

"Right now around 200 people are enrolled, but I would like to see that number increase to around 350 before school starts," Stewart said. "Who knows? If evening college becomes popular, a whole world of opportunities could start to exist."

Professor visits rural setting in Canada, learns new culture

BREE BISNETTE
staff reporter

Little Buffalo, Canada, has few modern accommodations to offer its visitors, but two Manhattan residents felt they had much to gain from a stay in the rural village.

Cia Verschelden, associate professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, and her husband, Dean Denner, ventured to Little Buffalo a month ago for a two-year stay with 500 Cree Indians.

The Cree have been struggling to keep their livelihood and culture from being stripped by the government who would like to exploit the land for its timber and mineral wealth.

"The Cree were living on the land, and oil was found," Verschelden said. "One Japanese company has been doing a lot of drilling in that area, and the Cree keep getting moved to smaller and smaller pieces of land."

The government has offered 95 square miles of land as a settlement.

"The Indians want the land, plus means to ensure they are self-sufficient and do not have to depend on welfare," Denner said.

The Cree want to begin farming and raising cattle and buffalo.

"It will take about six months to see how our talents can contribute to the community," Verschelden said.

Verschelden said she may be teaching at a small kindergarten through 12th grade school in the town. Denner's specialty is building and gardening.

While Verschelden and Denner are unsure of what their duties will be in serving the Cree, they know what the Cree have to offer them.

"We hope to learn about the native culture and just gain a better understanding of how some people are struggling for survival," Verschelden said.

Denner and Verschelden also hope their four children, ages 3, 5, 8 and 16, will benefit from living with the Cree for two years.

"The children don't have running water. We use an outhouse, there's not TV, and the house is about half of the size of the one we had in Manhattan," Verschelden said. "I think their needs and wants will be more modest when we return, and I hope they'll learn there's a different way to live."

Wareham hums with ska

staff writer

For live-music lovers, the semester started Friday night as the Wareham Opera House came alive with the insidious groove and grind of Hum, Truck Stop Love and MU330.

Hum's almost eerie winding and layers of psychedelic splintering elevated into a surreal rock that peaked with moshing and stage-diving.

Sponsored by KMKF-FM 101.5, St. Louis' MU330 launched the cosmic jam with its usual, unrelenting, hyperfunk ska.

live. music REVIEW

The band is preparing for a tour in October with Skankin' Pickle and will return to Manhattan Aug. 30 for the Welcome Back concert with Kill Creek, Fast Ball and Manhattan's Ultimate Fake Book.

"We've been touring constantly," Jason Nelson, fluorescent purple-haired vocalist, said. "Last year we put over 70,000 miles on our van, and since January we've already put 60,000 miles on our van."

In addition to an inexhaustible tour, MU330 has been as busy in the studio as it's been on the road.

In January, the band was signed to Dill Records, releasing "Chumps On Parade" in April, and recently returned to the studio for a compilation record with other Dill bands, including the Rudiments, Janitors Against Apartheid and Skankin' Pickle.

For the unmistakably ska band, it was a welcome opportunity to play with bands so far outside their genre, rather than the usual typecasted line-up.

"What I like about it is it's real diverse," said Ted Moll, drummer for MU330. "A lot of the time we don't get to play with different kinds of bands, other than just ska bills or punk bills."

The skanking crested into a mellow rock with a hillbilly edge and a touch of punk when Manhattan's own Truck Stop Love took the spotlight.

Setting a precedent as the first local band to stir national attention, TSL has been an inspiration and motivating force to most Manhattan bands, but guitarist Jim Crego said, "It's time to piss or get off the pot.

"If we don't have a record deal by the first of the year, we're done," Crego said. "We've been really slacking and coasting this year, and it's put-up or shut-up time.

"The last few months we've been in neutral," he said. "The ball is rolling right now, but we have all got a lot of other things going on and we have got to set some goals and try to attain them. We just need to get signed because we can't afford to do it on our own, but I totally love TSL, and I believe in it," he said.

The show was called off as a result of slow ticket sales, but later the Wareham was packed with approximately 350 people. The bands insisted on playing with or without a guarantee they would get paid.

"I'm really happy with the turnout," Ken Snook, promoter for STL Productions from Lawrence, said. "The advance tickets were so slow the show was almost canceled."

"For a promoter (last-minute ticket-buyers) are a nightmare. If it weren't for the guys really wanting to do the show anyway, it wouldn't have happened."

Despite the large number of last-minute patrons, there was no lack of enthusiasm or support for the bands.

"I came to see Truck Stop and basically to support local music in Manhattan," Seth Lamborn, senior in social sciences, said. "You've got to come to shows to get shows to come here.

"People should go out to every local show they can so that other bands will know that Manhattan is a cool place to go."

chapter and interact with its members. The dance continued Saturday, with rushees visiting as many as five houses again.

At each step along the way, the rushees and the chapters eliminated each other from consideration, each trying to find the best mix of personalities.

This was where the Rush counselors did the majority of their work, answering the rushees' questions and listening to their concerns.

"More than anything you just listen to them, how they're feeling about each house," Rinella said. "I think it gives them an opportunity to talk to an unbiased source."

Dougherty said by then the primary concern was finding similarities and meeting women she would get along with, and agreed the counselors were a valuable resource.

"Where I felt most comfortable, really — I was looking for where I fit in well with the girls who were already there," she said.

"The Rush counselors helped us stay focused. They didn't try to sway us one way or another, but just listened to what we had to say and helped us answer our own questions."

Sunday-morning invitations were extended for the final round of parties. Rushees were allowed to select as many as three chapters to visit for preference parties, which began that evening.

"By the time the girls have narrowed their choices down to three houses, statistics show they are likely to be equally happy in any of the three houses," Robel said.

"So the important thing is to make sure they have really thought about this decision and are not letting other people make it for them."

ANTICIPATION

Monday morning, the air could be cut with a knife. At 9:15 a.m. counselors would begin distributing invitations to pledge, but the rushees were anxiously reliving the week by 8 a.m.

"I liked all three of the houses I visited," one rushee told her cohorts. "I almost don't want to know where I'm going."

"Ten minutes," said another, followed by a long pause.

"I don't know," said a quiet voice, "but altogether I think I made the right choices."

Silence again filled the lobby.

"Five minutes."

A few minutes later, it was over. Of the 503 women originally signed up to rush, 32 had withdrawn, and seven had been dropped during the course of the week.

The remaining 464 were all extended invitations, with as many as 46 going to any individual house.

Each chapter took roll of its new pledges before beginning the journey to their new house — a journey that, for many, will be just the start of their life experiences at K-State.

Pulitzer a possibility for adviser

DAN LEWERENZ
assistant campus editor

Since 1990, anthropologist Bunny McBride has spent time on campus, unofficially advising K-State students. Last spring, K-State formalized the relationship, giving McBride the title of adjunct professor.

Little did the University know McBride was about to be nominated for the Pulitzer Prize in biography.

A practicing journalist who had studied English and fine arts in college, McBride was midway through work on her master of fine arts degree when she decided she needed a new approach.

"It was one of those unplanned career changes in that I had been in the realm of journalism, and what I was really drawn to write about was Third World development issues and cultural survival issues," McBride said. "And I felt, 'People are reading this, and people are believing it, but where's my foundational basis?'

"I felt I needed training, field training and real holistic training, not just writing training. I wanted perspective, the kind of perspective that would help me understand not just the news but the cultural context of the news."

Through work with a community youth center in Boston, McBride was introduced to the Mi' kmaq Indians, a tribe with ties to Maine and Newfoundland.

"The Mi' kmaq are the largest Indian population in Boston, and so I knew several Mi' kmaq families," she said. "A friend of mine was doing community development work with off-reservation Indians, and she said, 'Oh, you have a degree in anthropology. They just lost an anthropologist, and they need somebody. Would you help? They were left out of this huge land-claim settlement in Maine.' "

While McBride said she was apprehensive about taking the position, she had a friend coming from the Netherlands, Harald Prins, now a professor of anthropology at K-State, and suggested the position to him.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

BUNNY McBRIDE puts her book, "Molly Spotted Elk: A Penobscot in Paris," back on the shelf at her home.

In the end, the two decided to seek the position jointly, with McBride focusing on recording oral histories and community development while still writing extensively about African issues.

It was during that time Prins found a number of articles about Molly Spotted Elk, a Penobscot dancer, actress, model and journalist.

"Why are you going to Mali when you could be writing about Molly and not leaving so often?" McBride remembers Prins asking.

But it wasn't until she saw an article about Spotted Elk in a local paper that McBride decided to write about her.

"In this article there was this portrait picture of Molly, and it really grabbed my attention. So I called Molly's sister, Eunice, and said I wanted to write an article about her sister, maybe a book," she said.

McBride talked with Eunice Nelson-Bauman, Spotted Elk's sister, and Jean Archambaud Moore, Spotted Elk's daughter, about writing a magazine article. But other projects demanded her attention until 1991, when she began work in earnest on the book "Molly Spotted Elk: A Penobscot in Paris," published by the University of Oklahoma Press in 1995.

Spotted Elk, raised in Old Town on the Penobscot reservation in Maine, was a well-known dancer and actress in the United States before performing in the Colonial Exposition in Paris in 1931.

She decided to stay in France, where she would later marry Jean ("Johnny") Archambaud (after whom her daughter would be named), a Parisian journalist. Spotted Elk gave birth to her daughter in the States and later returned to France.

In 1940, she was forced to flee France on foot with her young daughter for Portugal, where she would take a ship back to America.

Throughout her time in France, she maintained her Penobscot traditions, teaching them to young Jean.

"She was well-rooted and held on to her traditions, her strengths, and yet she was always reaching out. And that's my view of real progress — marking out what is important and carrying it forward and taking it with you," McBride said.

"Here we are today in a society struggling with its own multicultural identity, and I thought if I could write her life in such a way that people felt they were taking her arm and experience what she experienced, that would help her effort to build bridges. And not just part of her life, but something that I really believe in, which is answering the question of how we can all live together in grace."

Biography brings Spotted Elk to life

DAN LEWERENZ
assistant campus editor

Molly Spotted Elk (1903-77) led a life most people, even in Hollywood, could only dream of.

Raised to respect her traditions on the Penobscot Indian Reservation (Old Town, Maine), she modeled for internationally known artists, including sculptor Bonnie MacLeary; achieved fame and critical acclaim for her roles on the big screen; danced her way from Old Town to New York and eventually to Paris; and married a Frenchman, only to flee the invading German armies over the Pyrenees on foot with her young daughter.

Her life has been the subject of numerous interviews in Maine newspapers. But Spotted Elk's story has now been captured in full in Bunny McBride's "Molly Spotted Elk: A Penobscot in Paris," (University of Oklahoma Press, 1995).

book REVIEW

A journalist and Columbia University-trained anthropologist, McBride recreates the details of Spotted Elk's life in a rich and inviting prose born of Spotted Elk's own diaries. McBride's anthropological training allows her to examine Penobscot life in Old Town without the patronizing tone so common in books about Indian people.

Born Molliedellis "Molly" Nelson, Spotted Elk (a stage name she took) faced racism early in life, but never accepted it. Many of her early romantic interests found her a curiosity — a beautiful, intelligent woman they could never accept as their equal.

Her dancing took her away from the East Coast and allowed her to express her traditions in a comfortable setting. But the stage was defined by the audience, who wanted to see Plains Indians in feathered headdress doing a war dance. McBride chronicles Spotted Elk's struggles and triumphs in the topsy-turvy world of entertainment, including her neverending struggle to accurately represent Indian people on stage and screen.

Molly's art took her to Paris, where a more curious and less biased populace gave her more freedom to express herself. There she met Jean "Johnny" Archambaud, later her husband and the father of her daughter Jean. In France she worked as a journalist and nearly had her first book published before civil unrest forced her to escape to America without her husband.

The Saturday Evening Post lauded Spotted Elk and "The Silent Enemy" as deserving of a Pulitzer Prize as "the best American dramatic creation for the year 1930" — and in an ironic fulfillment of that commendation, McBride's book has been nominated for the Pulitzer Prize for biography.

It is worthy of that and more. Accessible to the young reader, detailed enough for the scholar of Indian history, "Molly Spotted Elk" is an enjoyable book to read.

Fitness Facts

True or False! Five commonly held myths about lifting weights:

1) You have to be in shape first;
2) You'll become muscle-bound;
3) It's hard on joints;
4) You need expensive equipment;
5) It won't help you lose weight.

* False on all accounts says "Health" magazine (March/April 1996).

SGA members seek effective Senate with new government restructure plan

Inside

Opinion columnist Lach Franquemont suggests various ways college students can make the most of their post-high school experience.
Becoming involved in Student Governing Association is one of the options he offers.

MIRANDA KENNEDY

Student Governing Association members plan to restructure student government this year.

JoAnna Rothwell, SGA public relations director, said the restructure will make Student Senate more effective and more responsive to students.

Chris Collins, human ecology senator, said he thinks Senate will create a better relationship with the student body this year.

He said before he was a senator it was difficult for him to find out what was happening in Senate.

Senators will go to residence halls, fraternities and sororities to get in touch with students.

"Many people have ideas," Collins said. "They just don't know how to tell us about them."

Rothwell said Senate will also be working on teacher evaluations so students can learn about professors' teaching and testing styles before they enroll.

"The general consensus has been that we want them published in some form for students," Aubrey Abbott, Senate chair, said.

She said now that students pay linear tuition the University is more like a consumer market, so students should be able to know what they will pay for.

Jon Beall, SGA college council coordinator, said working with professors will be a big part of the TEVAL process.

Marcia Hellwig, long-term planning coordinator, said she would like more first-year students and more at-large students on committees. She said this would create a better cross-representation of campus.

"Once you get to be on Senate you lose a little bit of that perspective," she said.

Many other changes will be internal.

Hellwig has been working on a plan to revamp Senate for 1-1/2 years as a member of the long-term planning committee.

"I was on that committee, and we published what we would like to do for a whole revamped Senate," Hellwig said.

She said the committee wants to create a chief financial officer to Construction causes class-location changes

J.C. ASHLEY
staff reporter

Four classes of sociology and human ecology students were displaced Monday due to delinquent construction.

The Justin 109 lecture hall was still being worked on when students arrived Monday morning for Social Problems, and signs said the construction would continue until it is done next week.

"The work is progressing now. The carpet is in and now we can start on all of the finishing touches. The project should be complete for classes to resume on September 9," Helen Cooper, assistant director of facilities planning, said.

The delay had been relayed to most professors teaching in Justin 109, but some professors were surprised by the signs outside the entrances.

"We have been meeting with the faculty about the changes for about a year now and letters were sent out, but some of the new staff and student teachers might have had to walk a little extra distance to the Union Little Theater for class with their students," Cooper said.

Deb Canter, professor and program director of the coordinated program in dietetics, received the letter about the construction, but that didn't make her trek any shorter. Canter's class of Introduction to Professional Diet Practices was one of the four classes moved.

"My class was moved to Bob Dole Hall, Studio B," Canter said.

The improvements to Justin 109 will include a new multi-media podium equipped with a computer that can be projected onto a movie screen at the front of the classroom.

"All of my department's classes moving to being taught over TELENET, so the move to Dole was necessary for now, but they're converting the room to be fully mediated with all the bells and whistles. The technology is just taking a little longer to complete," Canter said.

Hochhauser, Peterson define platforms in time for state-representative elections

KENNY WENTWORTH
staff reporter

Residents and students in Manhattan don't have to look to national elections for political races. There are exciting races here in this area.

The race for the local district, which includes K-State, is between two people who know the area well.

The incumbent, Democrat Sheila Hochhauser, has had the position for the last eight years, while her opponent, Republican Jeff Peterson, a former K-State student body president, has been active with politics on the K-State campus.

> "I would gladly accept the challenge of helping this district create as many new jobs as possible."
> ● JEFF PETERSON
> FORMER STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT

Peterson said serving as student body president for two years has provided a great deal of experience, but he is ready to take it to the next level.

"By serving as student body president and living in Manhattan for a number of years, I have had a chance to see and really understand the people of this district.

"By representing them, I can give back to the community what it has given me," Peterson said.

Among the diverse issues that a candidate must tackle, Peterson said area growth is one of his main concerns.

"K-State and Manhattan are going to grow. Economic growth is what the future is all about.

"I would gladly accept the challenge of helping this district create as many new jobs as possible and helping the area maintain a stable economy," Peterson said.

Hochhauser also sees a great window of opportunity if she is elected to represent the district.

"It is so exciting to be a part of state government right now. The states are now expected to deal with all the issues the federal government hands them, and it is important we have good leadership in deciding what is best for Kansas," Hochhauser said.

Her previous years in the House of Representatives have led her to a spot on the Appropriations Committee.

"I feel like since I'm the only female on the committee, my opinion really means a lot and makes a difference," Hochhauser said.

She said she thinks the University and its students need to continuously be one of her primary concerns.

"In all the years I have been in the House, state funding for the University has not decreased," Hochhauser said. "One thing I take great pride in is supporting a program called the Hope Scholarship Program.

"This would take unused state money and transform it into a scholarship granted to students who maintain a 3.0 in high school and college, whose family income is below $29,000," Hochhauser said.

▶ WAGES

Minimum-wage increase benefits cause concern with businesses

KRIS BETHEA
staff writer

The hourly minimum wage will increase by 90 cents in about 13 months.

Beginning Oct. 1, minimum wage will increase to $4.75, and on Sept. 1, 1997, minimum wage will increase to $5.15 per hour.

At the Little Apple Brewing Company, 15 people will be affected by the minimum-wage rate increase.

"We don't have that many people below $4.75," said Russ Loub, general manager at Little Apple Brewing Company.

Most are tipped employees who make the federal-law minimum of $2.13 per hour, Loub said.

Loub said the Little Apple Brewing Company will have to absorb the increase because it cannot afford to cut back.

"It is going to result in a 5- to 10-percent increase in payroll," Loub said.

New employees under the age of 20 will receive a 90-day training wage of $4.25 when the increase goes into effect.

"That gives us 90 days to get their wages up to $4.75," Loub said.

Bryan Taylor, owner of The Palace Cards and Gifts, said paychecks will probably go up $25 and even more next year. The Palace has six student employees.

"Hopefully with the increase, there will be more money out there," Taylor said. "Right now it is a wait-and-see attitude."

Janae Lacock, freshman undecided, is glad for the increase.

"You wouldn't even believe how much of a difference 50 cents makes," Lacock said.

> I grew up in a small-business family. It seemed to hurt when the minimum wage went up last time.
> ● MARK LATHAM
> SENIOR IN ARCHITECTURE

However, not all students are happy with the increase because it might hurt small businesses.

"I grew up in a small-business family," Mark Latham, senior in architecture, said. "It seemed to hurt when the minimum wage went up last time."

Wes Blue, sophomore in environmental design, said the minimum-wage increase does not really upset him, but he said he is not sure it is a good idea.

"The costs of the products go up, and the services go down," Blue said.

Lacock said she is surprised at how many students did not know anything about the increase.

"A lot didn't know about the minimum-wage increase," Lacock said. "Most of the kids I talked to didn't even know about it, and it is usually the kids that it really affects."

More than 160 divers have worked along with Navy salvage vessels to recover about 60 percent of the aircraft from depths up to 120 feet. But the recovery doesn't mean investigators will be able to quickly identify the cause of the July 17 disaster that killed 230.

• FUNDS FROM GADHAFI. Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan is seeking the government's permission to accept $1 billion from Libya's Moammar Gadhafi, a gift he says would be used to mobilize American black voters and bolster their economic strength.

SPORTS

• GREEN FIRED AS METS MANAGER. The New York Mets, frustrated that their young players failed to play up to expectations, fired manager Dallas Green Monday and replaced him with former Texas Rangers manager Bobby Valentine. The Mets had hoped to contend for a playoff spot this season, but instead slid to a 59-72 mark. They are fourth in the NL East, 23 games behind first-place Atlanta and 12 games behind Montreal for the wild-card slot.

• OSBORNE ARRESTED. St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Donovan Osborne was arrested early Monday on charges of public intoxication and criminal trespass for refusing to leave a night club. Osborne, 27, the winning pitcher in the Cardinals' 1-0 victory against the Houston Astros Friday night, was booked at about 3:20 a.m. and released about 1-1/2 hours later. Osborne issued a statement Monday apologizing to fans and to the team.

• NO BREAKTHROUGHS IN BASEBALL TALKS. Baseball players and owners waited Monday for acting commissioner Bud Selig to make the next move, and there were no breakthroughs when the sides met for about an hour to discuss their remaining differences.

Green lines divide lots

campus editor

Parking Services did not make a mistake; the green lines in the parking lots are there for a reason.

Parking Services painted the lines on the parking lot to give students another visual indication besides the signs as to where they could park, Dave Amaro, assistant director of Parking Services, said.

Amaro said all the bigger student parking lots had been painted and there were plans for all student spaces to be painted green.

The green lines were painted at no cost or minimal additional cost to students. The parking lines are repainted every year, said Amaro.

Some students found the lines helpful, while other students did not realize the purpose of the green lines or even notice the change.

Judy Velicoff, freshman undecided, said before the lines were painted green she had questions as to the difference between faculty and student parking, especially in combined lots such as A-30.

"They're helpful. Now I know where to park," she said.

Amaro said he thought the lines in addition to the signs would reduce the number of tickets given to students.

C.W. Cheney, senior in recreation and parks administration, said students already know where parking is available.

"I don't think anybody doesn't know. If they got a ticket, then they parked there because they were in a hurry," he said.

Amaro said lot A-30 was resurfaced this summer at a cost of $60,000, and other repairs were made to other lots at a cost of $92,000-95,000.

Archery Road, near the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, is being paved at a cost of $150,000-250,000, Amaro said.

Sudanese jet hijacked over Middle East

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LARNACA, Cyprus — A Sudanese jetliner carrying 199 passengers and crew members was hijacked Monday en route to Jordan. A hijacker claiming to have grenades and TNT demanded asylum in London.

After refueling in Cyprus, Flight 150 of state-run Sudan Airways took off again, bound for Britain. One hijacker promised to free all 186 passengers and 13 crew members and surrender once the plane reached London, said Glafcos Xenos, a police spokesperson in the control tower at Cyprus' Larnaca International Airport.

Even after the plane left Cyprus, police said they did not know exactly how many hijackers were aboard the Airbus 310 or what their nationalities were.

During the flight's two hours on the ground in Larnaca, authorities tried to win the release of at least the women and children on the plane, police spokesperson Tasos Panayiotou said.

"But the hijackers threatened to use hand grenades and TNT," he said. "We did our utmost but were not able to win the release of any passengers."

Authorities allowed the plane to refuel and take off on the four-hour flight to London.

The plane's pilot said there were several hijackers on board, police said, although Cyprus civil-aviation director Michael Herodotou said he believed there to be only one. It was not clear whether Cyprus authorities had talked to more than one man directly.

During its stay in Cyprus, the plane was parked away from the terminal building at Larnaca, on the southern edge of the Mediterranean island, and was surrounded by police. It took off for London shortly before 1 a.m. Tuesday.

The plane left the Sudanese capital of Khartoum about 6:30 p.m. en route to Amman, Jordan, and was hijacked about 25 minutes later, said Mohammad Qassem, an aviation official in the control tower in Cairo, Egypt.

The pilot contacted the Cairo tower, told officials the plane had been hijacked and requested permission to fly through Egyptian airspace to Rome, he said. Moments later, the pilot said he would go to Larnaca because the plane didn't have enough fuel.

Officers might question suspect in border slayings

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Missouri law officers have joined their Kansas counterparts in saying they want to question an Oklahoma murder suspect about several deaths or missing persons in their states.

Karl L. Myers, 48, is being held in Claremore, Okla., on charges of rape, robbery and first-degree murder in the killings of two Oklahoma women whose bodies were found in mine shafts on the Kansas-Oklahoma border.

Myers, of Inola, Okla., was arrested last week and faces a Sept. 24 preliminary hearing.

Jasper County, Mo., Capt. Stephen Weston said Monday he hopes to make plans to interview Myers about a woman who has been missing from Jasper County for two years. He would not give specifics of the case.

"We're interested in talking to him. It's a missing person that we may try to talk to him about," Weston said.

"I'd rather not tell you (which case), because all the family's still living here, and I don't want them reading it in the paper."

On Monday, the Kansas Bureau of Investigation said its agents are interested in Myers.

"We have been in contact with the Oklahoma authorities, and we are looking into anything that might lead into Kansas," said KBI special agent Scott Teeselink at the bureau's Topeka headquarters.

He declined to specify what cases the KBI was examining with respect to Myers.

Cherokee County sheriff Pat Collins said an investigator will interview Myers this week in connection with the deaths of two women and a man nearly 20 years ago.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Be courteous; we all have to use sidewalks

Problems on this campus are deeper than parking or ticket sales. It's a matter of simple courtesy — sidewalk courtesy.

For those of you who don't already know, you're not supposed to ride your bike on the sidewalk. If you know and decided to ignore it, you're a jerk, and we hope you get fined.

WHY WE CARE

Bikers, pedestrians, rollerbladers and drivers all need to get around campus. Simple courtesy will make that easier for all.

Yes. There is a fine. A $10 fine.

How fast can you really go in a crowd of people rushing to get to class, anyway?

And for you pedestrians, stay off the bike paths. You have the sidewalks. Bicyclists have the bike paths. It's that simple.

Rollerbladers are also presenting a hazard not only to the walkers, but also to themselves. A collision could cause considerable ouchies.

And how about those facilities vehicles cruising around like they're on a golf course, forcing walkers off the sidewalk? We understand that they have to get from point A to point B, but it might be wiser to try not to do so in high-pedestrian congestion times.

I think Woody the Owl said it best when he said, "Give a hoot. Don't pollute." Don't throw your cigarette butts on the ground when you can easily hold them until you find a trash receptacle.

And we understand that most of us haven't seen our pals all summer, but stopping in the middle of the sidewalk to say hi to your roommate from three years ago while hordes of hurried class-goers stumble over each other trying not to run into you is not too considerate. A simple "Hey, gimme a call," should suffice.

If you feel you need more chat time, try the K-State Student Union.

K-State is a pedestrian-controlled campus. So if you're driving through campus, don't run over pedestrians crossing the street.

On the same note, if a car is kind enough to stop for you while you cross the street, do so briskly so you don't hold up traffic.

In short, be nice.

Politically vague

Candidates, voters rest too comfortably with family values

Hey! How's everybody doing?

Now when I go to check my e-mail next time, I really don't expect or hope to be confronted by a barrage of ailment lists and juicy summer-vacation tales.

In all honesty, I don't want to know how every single person on campus is doing. The question just seemed like a nice, friendly way to establish contact with my readers.

MY

Keely SCHIELDS

Perhaps because I lack the ability to sustain chit chat myself, I'm especially in tune to the perfunctory things people say. Without a doubt, "Hi. How are you?" has to be the most common question we don't particularly want anyone to expand upon.

It's usually so empty and automatic — virtually as empty and automatic as "family values" rolling off the lips of a political candidate.

By this point in a big election year, I've heard the phrase "family values" so many times that I've become completely numb to it, but earlier on, my first response to these words was to want a specific example of a family value.

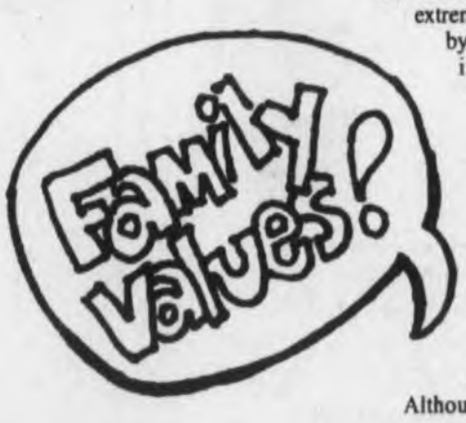
Like someone who is simply doing "fine," though, nobody ever seems to provide the specifics.

As far as I can tell, "family values" is a comfortably vague phrase that tends to fall just as comfortably on the ears of voters.

Certainly part of the comfort of "family values" stems from sheer familiarity.

You hear it every time you turn on the news.

You see it every time you read through the paper.



However, there also hovers about the phrase a confident presumption that everyone agrees upon what these various family values are, and there is comfort in the thought that a given political candidate values those obvious values.

Hence, it's only common sense that no candidate would unnecessarily risk alienating his faithful by delving too far into specifics.

Maybe I'm dull, but I cannot for the life of me see what seems so evident to so many.

Of course, I know what my own family's values are, and I've found that our values differ from those of my friends' families. I also suspect that their families' values are equally unique in relation to each other.

For this reason, I get extremely irritated by the narrow implications of "family values."

On some tongues, "family values" sounds narrow enough to be prescriptive. Although I still could not rattle off a precise list of the family values, I have inferred an idea of the prescribed path one ought to follow in order to possess the family values, and it goes exactly like this:

First comes love. Then comes marriage. Then comes ...

The rest is obvious, isn't it?

When we were 6 years old, we all learned the ways of life families ought to value.

Actually, the prescribed path is a fine way to live, but I would think that after the age of 6, most folks would manage to make a little room in their minds for deviation.

I would also think that family values in general would be a very difficult thing for an elected official — or even a whole bunch of elected officials — to alter in any way.

Once again, mentioning "family values" might just be a candidate's way of establishing contact.

It works.

But when it almost reaches the point of campaigning with "Hi. Family values," the time has come to wonder whether values aren't better left in the family.

Experience all of college

Lach FRANQUEMONT

College life. Books and classes, all-nighters, studying and partying, lectures, football.

So here we are again, ready to start another semester.

My name's Lach, and I'm the resident radical leftist here. In my upcoming columns, I hope to introduce many of you to different ways of looking at issues.

I believe quality of human life must always take precedent over monetary concerns, and we do have an obligation to take care of eachother.

I also believe that everyone has the basic rights to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness, and the right to infringe on that for reasons of race, gender or sexual orientation is a crime.

In my first column, though, I'd like to stay away from political partisanship and talk about an element of college that often gets ignored by many.

Getting involved.

Too many students in college look at it as merely a way into a higher income bracket. They go to classes (or don't if they can get away with it), party on weekends and in four, or often more, years get a degree that gives their resumes a little more umph than it otherwise would have had.

In the process, they miss out on one of the most profound effects college can have on a person: making them into well-rounded individuals and involved citizens.

Although it has become cliché to say so, I'll do it again. Those who say there's nothing to do in Manhattan simply aren't looking hard enough.

McCain Auditorium consistently puts on quality entertainment. This fall, performances range from Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" to The Who's rock opera "Tommy."

The K-State theater department puts on good performances in both Nichols Hall and the Purple Mask Theatre. The Union puts on two movies a week ranging from the highly interesting Kaleidoscope series to feature films.

Numerous nationally recognized speakers come to K-State every semester through the Landon and Lou Douglas lecture series. In addition, campus organizations frequently bring in quality speakers.

Both on campus and in the community, virtually any type of music you'd care to hear can be found periodically. Most shows are advertised on bulletin boards or telephone poles.

The opportunities to get involved in activities and causes are virtually unlimited. There are almost 400 registered clubs on campus, and they need more people to get involved. Whatever your interest, chances are good that you can find others who share them by stopping by the Office of Student Activities and Services.

The Union Program Council has numerous committees for people to get involved in. You might even get lucky and get the chance to bring another Soul Asylum to campus.

The Student Government Association also has numerous committees for which it needs at-large members. If you live in the residence halls, SGA has numerous ways to get involved.

Many community groups and churches also are looking for student involvement. The facts are that with so much going on there's no excuse for boredom.

Why is all of this so important? After all, many students have their hands full with study and work.

It's important because if you don't begin to to get involved while in college, chances are that you may never.

College shouldn't be merely for a degree. The experiences that you have outside the classroom can be just as valuable as those you have in class.

I look forward to once again giving you my input this semester, and I welcome yours, too. As a senator in the College of Arts and Sciences, I welcome your input on any student issues.

I hope all of you have a great semester filled with a variety of things and not just books.

Football game safety

Editor,

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics would like to welcome all K-State students back to Manhattan. The upcoming year promises to be exciting, because the Wildcat football team is ranked among the nation's elite for the fourth consecutive year. And with the toughest schedules in school history on tap in the first year of the Big 12 Conference, the excitement at KSU Stadium promises to be unmatched in school history.

As you walk around KSU Stadium, you will notice many changes that will make Saturdays even more enjoyable for fans. A Sony JumboTron video system has been installed on the roof of the Vanier Football Complex at the north end of the stadium to give fans instant replays, highlights and much more. New scoreboards and message centers have been placed in the southeast and southwest corners of the stadium as well.

As the K-State football team improves and grows in national stature, we hope Wildcat fans continue to establish themselves as some of the nation's best. Fan support has been a significant reason for the improvement on the field, but fans should remember not to let enthusiasm put others in dangerous situations in overzealous on-field celebrations.

The K-State athletic department is always striving to improve customer services at KSU Stadium. To do this, we have established policies and procedures to enhance the comfort and safety of our patrons. For help at the stadium, contact an usher or visit one of the fan-accommodation centers in the southeast or southwest corners or under the press box on the west side. Items or activities prohibited at KSU Stadium include alcoholic beverages or controlled substances, smoking in seating areas and lines, glass bottles, cans, thermos bottles (over two quarts), bota bottles, picnic baskets, large bags, ice chests, horns, noise makers, umbrellas, unauthorized sales and solicitation, and banners, placards or leaflets not approved by the athletic department.

The parking situation at KSU Stadium is one of the best in the Big 12, but it could still be congested. Stadium parking lots will open no later than three hours prior to game time, with 2,500 general parking spaces available on the east side and 600 in the west lot. These lots, however, are usually full within one hour of game time.

One solution to parking and avoiding traffic delays would be to take advantage of the free bus shuttle sponsored by Aggieville merchants and Westloop Shopping Center. Fans may ride shuttles from parking lots at Weber Hall, the K-State Student Union, Memorial Stadium and residence-hall lots. The cost of the shuttle is 50 cents per person each way.

As many of you drove into Manhattan in recent days probably noticed, there is plenty of road construction. Fans coming to KSU Stadium from the west (Kansas Highway 18) should use Scenic Drive, while fans coming from the east should take Tuttle Creek Boulevard to Kimball Avenue, where they can reach the stadium.

Students will again be able to purchase tickets through ICAT (I Contributed a Thirty), which helps support the athletic scholarship fund. This season, members of ICAT will be given a wristband that will allow admittance into the special reserved seating for each game. Only the first 1,800 fans to purchase ICAT will have a seat in section 24 of the stadium.

K-State football has become one of the hottest tickets around, and KSU Stadium is one of the most exciting venues in the country. Purple pride is evident everywhere you look in Manhattan and on the K-State campus. The athletic department hopes everyone in attendance during the 1996 season has a great time experiencing Wildcat football during the inaugural Big 12 season.

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics

English as the official language

Editor,

I am writing in support of English as the official language.

This issue is extremely important, more important than most of us realize. I am a naturalized citizen since 1974. My children, all born here, are 22, 19 and 14 years old. We spoke English at home deliberately and almost exclusively to give them a clear, unconfusable message.

Allowing multiple languages (other than English) is misguided and shortsighted. The problem it will create in the future is unimaginable. It may mean an end to one united country.

It would be nice if the whole world spoke one language, but it is impractical for now. The next best thing is to have one common language. English comes pretty close.

I have utmost respect for all great languages of the world. But the pace of technological innovation is such that countries where English is not available are likely to suffer. And for countries already speaking English, giving up the advantage would be a big step backward.

I appeal to our good sense and practicality.

There are plenty of historical blunders to learn from, and there is enough evidence of the goodness of a common language.

Canadian group signs on with Huck Boyd Institute

▶ Agreement establishes a public-private partnership with the Huck Boyd Institute at K-State and the Institute of Rural Development in Canada.

JEREMY KELLEY
staff writer

The Huck Boyd National Institute at K-State, an institute that strives to strengthen small rural communities, recently signed an agreement of communication with the Institute of Rural Development in Manitoba, Canada.

The agreement was spawned by the policy issues concerning the North American Free Trade Agreement. These issues led the Huck Boyd Institute to develop the concept of a north-south trade corridor from Mexico to the North.

"The corridor provides an educational agreement between us and the institute in Canada, and it allows for trade routes on highways going North," said Ron Wilson, director of the Huck Boyd Institute. "It's a loose partnership."

Some of the main issues the Huck Boyd Institute will be dealing in the future include youth-leadership programs, economic development, health care, value-added processing agricultural products, structure of local government and natural-resource issues.

"The agreement we made is a public-private partnership between us and the Canadian institute," he said. "By no means is it a merger, but rather a loose relationship."

This agreement commits the two institutes to share information with each other, exchange publications and similarities on rural policy issues, and spawn new ways of exchange between the two institutes.

The Huck Boyd Institute is a foundation that was established in honor of McDill "Huck" Boyd, a long-time rural supporter and politician in Kansas.

Members of the Huck Boyd Institute include Mrs. McDill "Huck" Boyd and Cy Moyer, Phillipsburg; K-State president Jon Wefald and dean of agriculture Marc Johnson; Allie Devine, Topeka; Nelson Krueger, Lawrence; Joe Berkely, Dodge City; Doyle Rahjes, Agra; and Kyle Bauer, Clay Center.

"The Huck Boyd Institute is oriented to teach self-help for communities," Wilson said. "Basically what we do is give outreach to communities."

The institutes have many similarities. Both were formed in 1989, share many of the same goals and are at public universities. The Institute of Rural Development is at Brandon University in Manitoba, Canada.

"We learned of this institute, which had remarkable similarities to ours," he said. "We found that we had a lot in common."

The institute at K-State has an advisory committee that is responsible for communicating with its partner to the north.

Huck Boyd was a leading journalist in Kansas and a longtime K-Stater. He served as a politician in his hometown and in Kansas for more than 20 years. Boyd was a strong supporter of rural people.

"He was a great booster of Kansas," Wilson said. "He did so much for rural Kansas and the community of Phillipsburg."

The spirit of Huck Boyd and his desire to strengthen rural communities still lives within the institute; furthermore, it is the main goal of the institute to help rural people help themselves.

The Huck Boyd Institute has a daily afternoon radio program highlighting entrepreneurs and outstanding communities on KKSU-AM 580.

"We do this to highlight those small business people who have been successful in rural communities in Kansas," Wilson said.

The institute at K-State also has a separate branch, which focuses on community media.

"We have a bunch of volunteers who specialize in assisting communities with newspapers," said Linda Gilmore, graduate teaching assistant for the community media branch. "We had a group of people who went to Almena a few years ago to start the Prairie Dog Press, and the newspaper is still being printed today."

The branch strives to interact with communities to determine their communication needs.

Back-to-school depression hinders many students at university level

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

Moving away from home, making new friends and starting new classes can be exciting and stressful. Sometimes the stress can get to be too much, causing the back-to-school blues.

Feeling depressed and overwhelmed is a typical adjustment response for students, said Ata Karim, a therapist at University Counseling Services.

Ways to beat depression

Take a deep breath.
Think positively.
Make lists.
Exercise.
Believe in others.
Believe in yourself.
Enjoy breakfast.
Never drink and drive.
Read good books.
Avoid junk food.
Visualize a peaceful scene.
Call a friend.
Give hugs.
Seek hugs.
Set realistic goals.
Count to 10.
Do neck rolls.
Cry if you need to.
Prioritize tasks.
Eat right.
Be flexible.
Reward yourself.
Laugh often.
Take a deep breath.

"There is obviously a lot of stress involved with being a student," Karim said.

Each student's response to this stress is different.

The symptoms of stress and depression can manifest themselves in many ways. Physical symptoms can include headaches, stomachaches, insomnia and sore shoulders. Feeling down, unmotivated, irritable or restless can be psychological signs of depression.

Karim said one of the keys to managing stress and avoiding depression is time management. He suggested getting involved but trying not to take on too many tasks or responsibilities.

University Counseling Services and Pawnee Mental Health Services have pamphlets available with helpful hints for the stressed-out student. Eating breakfast, listening to your favorite music and talking to friends or family can help keep the blues away.

According to literature distributed by University Counseling Services, one of the best ways to beat depression is to pretend.

"Put a smile on your face, and pretend that you are happy ... Research demonstrates that forming a facial expression actually changes how you feel inside."

Karim said exercise is an excellent outlet for stress. In addition, he suggested making friends with classmates who might be in a similar situation to help keep from feeling alone.

Things that might seem to help cure the blues may actually make them worse. After about four hours the effects of caffeine are depression. A few cups of coffee will bring a temporary boost but later will cause an opposite effect.

With exams, classes and socializing it will be tempting to sleep in, but establishing a routine bedtime and wake-up time helps the body to function properly.

If depression disrupts day-to-day functioning or if stress gets to be too much, there are services available to students who would like some help. Clinical depression is more than just feeling stressed or a little down. Thoughts of suicide, drug and alcohol abuse, or violent behavior are indications of a serious problem.

At University Counseling Services, each student is entitled to five free sessions per semester with a therapist. Group therapy, sessions with four or more other students, is available at a per-semester rate of $20. Classes on stress management and relaxation are also available.

Trial begins Monday for Junction City death

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JUNCTION CITY — Two of the three people charged in the 1992 death of a man gunned down while jogging went to trial Monday in Geary County District Court.

Dana Lynn Flynn, 34, and her brother, Mikel Dreiling, 23, are charged with the murder of Randall Sheridan, 40. He was hit with five shotgun blasts on Dec. 22, 1992, as he jogged about a half-mile from his home southwest of Junction City.

The third defendant, former Assemblies of God minister Jerry Rollins, 57, will be tried separately later. All three are charged with first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit murder and conspiracy to commit perjury.

At the time of Sheridan's death, he and Flynn were engaged in a custody battle over a daughter born of an affair they had while he was separated from his wife.

Authorities believe members of a small Salina church founded by Rollins orchestrated and tried to cover up the crime. They say Rollins was Flynn's lover and mentor, prophesying to her and her family that Sheridan was an evil man who was abusing his daughter. Child welfare investigators found nothing to substantiate the abuse allegation.

The case has been delayed by problems with evidence, scheduling conflicts and appointment of a judge.

Arts and sciences senators may be divided by academic areas within the college in the future.

Hellwig said her committee will be working with other ways to improve Senate's efficiency.

"Senate meetings have really gotten long and out of control," she said.

She said she would like to cut paperwork so senators can focus more on student issues.

Fall 1996 Evening College Courses

Kansas State University

Evening College has been added to the K-State After Hours program. Evening College/After Hours offers classes on campus at 4:30 p.m. or later, and includes courses that meet requirements for several undergraduate and graduate degrees. Evening College will offer courses, generally between 6:00 p.m. and 10:00 p.m., that are required in most degree programs and that have high enrollments during daytime hours. A popular feature of many evening college courses will be their 8-week schedule which will allow students to complete courses in half the time of the traditional semester courses. Students enrolled in Evening College/After Hours can continue their education while working full-time and meeting family obligations, improving and gaining skills which will enable them to do better on the job or move into a more rewarding position.

Teams provide opportunity club sports

▪ K-State offers students chance to participate in non-varsity sports competitively.

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

So you didn't make the Wildcat football team. Or maybe volleyball coach Jim Moore overlooked you for a scholarship for the coming season.

Don't despair — K-State offers a variety of club sports, providing an opportunity for exercise and competition.

Curt Thurman, director of club sports for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics said, nearly 1,000 students compete on club teams ranging from rugby to rodeo, racquetball to rock climbing.

"Most people are looking for another outlet, another way of exercising with a competitive flair," Thurman said.

"They look at sports clubs as another way beyond the intramural route."

Some students find that sports clubs offer a chance to continue competing in a sport K-State does not offer at the varsity level, like soccer and softball, Thurman said. Others are interested in trying new sports, like lacrosse.

Competitive teams exist for both men and women in a variety of sports. Most compete against clubs from other schools, and many of K-State's squads are among the nation's finest.

"Last year the men's soccer club went to the National Intramural and Recreational Sports Association national championships in Texas, and they took second place," Thurman said.

K-State's men's and women's rugby teams, rodeo club and table tennis club have also scored well at regional and national competitions in recent years.

Thurman said he hopes to meet with club presidents sometime next week to discuss activities for the upcoming year.

Taekwondo Club wants new members

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

Thinking of trying to join an activity that is not solely based on sports but gets you in shape at the same time?

K-State's Taekwondo Club might have something for you.

"It's a really fun atmosphere," Lowell Coln, club instructor, said. "It's something that is not just sports-oriented. It's something that is set up for the individual.

"We've had ladies come in and say that they wanted to drop a couple dress sizes, and we give them a workout that can allow them to do it."

The health benefits do not stop at losing weight.

"It's an art that improves mostly cardiovascular fitness, coordination, balance and flexibility," Coln said.

"It can help you improve, no matter what your fitness level is, and develops muscles that other exercises don't."

For More Information
Contact Lowell Coln at 539-9161.

The club, with only about 12 members at this time, is looking to expand.

"We only have a $10 membership charge, which is money we save to buy equipment down the road," Mal Hoover, club adviser, said.

"If students want to come and see what our club is like, we of course won't charge anything," Hoover said. "If students do decide to join the club, it's a great deal. Instructor Coln allows us to use his facilities for free."

Coln, one of the original founders of the club, is the unofficial sponsor of the organization.

"It's good for me, because it allows me to get to work with new people," Coln said.

Coln carries world-class experience to the table with his instructing skills. Coln recently competed at the world championships in June, taking first in sparring and third in forms.

"It's quite a feat for anybody in taekwondo," Coln said. "It was pretty incredible. There were 5,000-some competitors, and I was one of the last people to compete. It was quite a spectacle to see."

"Absolutely anybody is welcome, no matter what your skill level is," Hoover said. "It's not some macho, everybody-kill-each-other thing. We like to have a good time."

Dreaming the possible dream: K-State — 35, Texas Tech — 9

I am a sick, sick man, and someone needs to get me some help.

I have waited way too long for Aug. 31 to come, and now it's almost here.

I have dreamed about this day. In detail.

Kevin Lockett stole the show with two diving post-pattern touchdowns.

Afterwards, all he did was smile and say it really wasn't as difficult as it looked.

Nyle Wiren took off Texas Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge's head.

Then Wiren did the same to Lethridge's replacement.

Chris Canty played flawless defense, caught his first pass and returned a punt 68 yards for a touchdown, untouched.

And, yes, the purple socks were there. Canty wore them higher than ever.

This isn't even the worst of it.

A couple of days ago I set my Sega Genesis up to play K-State and Texas Tech in College Football '96 against itself.

Despite two first-quarter interceptions, the Wildcat offense regrouped, and the defense shut out the Red Raiders in the second half, including a crucial fourth-down hold in the last minute of the game. Final score: K-State 21, Texas Tech 14.

MY

Todd STEWART

Last week a few friends and I put the K-State Marching Band compact disc in a stereo and repeatedly listened to "Wildcat Victory" and "Wabash Cannonball," so loudly it might have awakened Aggieville. For some reason, neither of the songs got old. They just got better each time we played them.

Football is almost here, and if you sleep well this Friday night, something is wrong with you.

Your heart should be racing. Your body should be shaking. You should lose all feeling in your fingertips.

If you do not meet all of the above requirements, go somewhere else because I do not want you here. And don't come back.

I know many people who are going to make sure their stereos wake them up gameday morning to "Wildcat Victory." Everyone should follow that lead. I know I will.

It is now just a matter of hours.

K-State's football team is way too talented and way too pumped to let this game slip away. I know the team will come through. The losses of Joe Gordon and Eric Hickson don't even phase my optimism.

I have 100-percent faith in Mike Lawrence, and the defensive backs don't worry me one bit.

Lockett will catch a long touchdown pass in the first quarter and then be double-teamed all day, leaving Jimmy Dean in single coverage. He'll get his big catch early in the second half.

The defense will be unforgiving and will shut down the Red Raider attack.

Final score: K-State 35, Texas Tech 9.

So, if you'll excuse me now, I must return to my own little happy place of K-State dream football. I've been away for way too long.

And if you decide to enter my little world, enter at your own risk, and don't ever try to talk to me while "Wildcat Victory" is playing. This, my friends, is sacred.

▶ WOMEN'S CREW

Organizational meeting for women's crew tonight

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

After more than a year of preparation, K-State has a varsity crew program, and Coach Jennifer Hale has an assistant coach.

Now all they need is a team.

Hale spent the summer reviewing candidates before hiring Debra Morgan as her assistant. Morgan spent the last two years as the head coach at the University of California-Irvine, serving as the novice coach before taking the top job.

Hale said Morgan's experiences at UC-Irvine make her a natural at K-State.

"The women's program at Irvine had been elevated to the level of the men's program and started using the boathouse, so she's familiar with the Title IX types of issues we'll face here," she said.

Hale also said the idea of promoting women coaches helped shape her decision.

"One of the things I was looking for was a woman for the job," Hale said. "I believe in women coaching women and giving women a chance to move into the coaching ranks."

Now that the coaching staff is complete, assembling a team is the top priority.

Hale said eight to 12 members of last year's club team returned, and most of them are sophomores. The majority of the athletes have yet to be recruited.

"I think the main thing is that people need to understand they don't have to have any experience rowing," Hale said.

"We want people who'll bring athleticism, who'll bring a strong work ethic and who'll bring a positive attitude."

To compete or not to compete? Player's choice, Snyder says

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Only weeks before football camp begins, many freshman recruits participate in state all-star games. For some programs, such as Nebraska, participation is not encouraged to prevent injuries that could hurt the program.

At K-State, Coach Bill Snyder said he disagrees with that mindset. Snyder said he insists the choice should be the player's, not the program's.

"It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," he said. "They (the players) only have one chance to be a senior in high school. They have only one chance to be selected for and play in an all-star game at the high-school level. I certainly wouldn't want to take that away from them."

But still, the possibilities for injury exist. A player who chooses to play in an all-star game dances a dangerous waltz with fate.

Incoming Wildcat Shad Meier, a tight end from Pittsburg, danced that waltz. Unfortunately for K-State, the dance ended early.

Meier left the Kansas Shrine Bowl midway through the game with a torn ligament in his left knee. But the experience was worth it, Meier said.

"I wanted to play. The game was for charity, and charity is money for those Shrine Kids," he said.

Wanting to play is one thing, but playing for charity is another, and Meier said the reality of the purpose of the game did not hit home for him until the week before the game.

The Kansas Shriners sent all the all-star players to St. Louis to visit the Shriners Hospital.

"You see those kids and how they live their lifestyle, and you realize you can help them," Meier said. "The Shrine game meant a lot more then."

One boy stuck most in Meier's mind, he said.

David, a youth around Shad's age, was at the Shriners Hospital because he had a knee injury.

"Looking back, I feel really bad for him," Meier said. "He tore all the ligaments in both of his knees, and I only tore one ligament in one knee."

Meier was expected to redshirt this season, so his injury does not hurt K-State's program. Even if it did, Snyder said he would still not prohibit his players from participating in all-star games.

"It was an unfortunate incident that took place," Snyder said.

"I feel badly for Shad. I think everything will be fine. But it (the injury) hasn't altered my view. I would feel uncomfortable taking that option away from him."

It is the option to do something once in a lifetime — to play in a high-school, all-star game and help those less fortunate than oneself.

▶ VOLLEYBALL

Program receives new look

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

After 10 days of two-a-days, the K-State volleyball team will begin regular practices today before leaving for the Northwestern Invitational in Evanston, Ill.

Volleyball coach Jim Moore said he has high expectations for the team this year.

"Two-a-days have been going OK," Moore said. "We're relatively healthy, and I definitely think this year's team is better than last year's. It just depends on how we improve during the season."

The team adds five freshmen this year in Abbie Brown, Dawn Cady, Heather Lindell, Linsey Luther and Mandy Whitfield.

Moore said he expects the class to have an immediate effect.

"The freshmen have made a huge impact and definitely made the team better," Moore said. "The returners have stepped up, making us all-around stronger."

The team also has a new assistant coach this season, because Jeff Reavis stepped down to pursue different opportunities.

Molly Mooney has filled Reavis' position. Mooney comes to K-State as a 1996 graduate from Tennessee, where she holds nearly every assist record in the Volunteers' history.

Moore said Mooney has been working well with the team.

"She first arrived here at the same time the girls did," Moore said. "Everybody likes her a lot, and I don't think we've even lost a beat."

The team is also getting new locker rooms, which are to be completed some time this week from money raised by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Mother Teresa recovers slowly after infection

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CALCUTTA, India — Mother Teresa sat up in bed and showed other signs of recovery Monday following six days of treatment in a Calcutta hospital for a faltering heart and lung infection.

"We are very hopeful, though she is still not out of danger," said Dr. Sandeep Lahiri, who is part of a team of six physicians treating the ailing Catholic nun.

Mother Teresa found the strength to gather herself up in bed for a few minutes and scribble a note saying "I want to see sisters."

Over the weekend, her condition stabilized, but her heartbeat remained irregular, and she was required to be on a respirator. By Monday evening, doctors had cut her time on the respirator to about half, said J.C. Ghosh, a cardiologist at the Woodlands Nursing Home in Calcutta.

Calcutta archbishop Henry D'Souza visited Mother Teresa to wish her a happy birthday.

Mother Teresa turns 86 today, but many people in Calcutta celebrate the occasion a day early.

"She held my hand as I greeted her," D'Souza said. "She said she was feeling pain from the respirator but was otherwise feeling better."

On Monday, at the headquarters of the order she founded, more than 400 nuns, priests and visitors sang hymns during a birthday observance.

In 1993, then Indian prime minister P.V. Narasimha Rao erroneously sent birthday greetings to Mother Teresa a day early, and many people since have marked the occasion on both days.

National preteen pageant draws 2 local girls to Florida

JACQUELINE BONE
staff reporter

Two local girls are on their way to Orlando, Fla., to compete in a pageant.

Rebecca and Kelly Knupfer, ages 8 and 7, respectively, both placed in the top 10 at the junior preteen level in Premiere Production's Regional Kansas City Pageant Aug. 10 and 11.

Rebecca Knupfer and Kelly Knupfer are the daughters of Nancy Knupfer, professor of adult education, and Peter Knupfer, professor of Civil War history.

Kelly Knupfer won second runner-up in her age group. She pointed proudly to the trophy she won.

Rebecca Knupfer also won a trophy, and both girls won the money for the entry fee for the national competition in February. Rebecca Knupfer and Kelly Knupfer went to local businesses for sponsorship to help cover the costs of entering the pageant. They also found other unique ways to earn the money.

"I found money under the couch," Kelly Knupfer said.

"And between the cushions," said Rebecca Knupfer.

The girls plan to sell lemonade and cookies, and rally support from local businesses. They might also have a raffle to help raise money for nationals.

The pageant emphasizes poise and confidence-building skills. Contestants conducted a private interview with judges, modeled sportswear and formalwear on stage, and fielded questions. on stage during competition.

Court decides funeral home committed fraud in burned infant bodies case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A funeral home committed fraud by burning infants' bodies as medical waste instead of cremating them as specified in an agreement with a hospital, Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon said Monday.

> "The actions by the funeral home staff ... not only violated the contract, they were highly insensitive to the parents (who were) subjected to the emotional stress of losing a child.
> • JAY NIXON
> MISSOURI ATTORNEY GENERAL

Nixon filed a consumer fraud lawsuit in Jackson County circuit court in Kansas City, Mo., naming Muehlebach Funeral Home, owner James S. Harrington and managing funeral director Eugene Belvin.

The funeral home had promised St. Luke's Hospital of Kansas City, Mo., to cremate the bodies, although Muehlebach is not licensed as a crematory, Nixon said. Muehlebach could have contracted with another business to perform the cremations, but instead had the remains incinerated, he said.

"The actions by the funeral home staff in this case not only violated the contract, they were highly insensitive to the parents (who were) subjected to the emotional stress of losing a child," Nixon said.

"We are asking the court to issue an injunction (against Muehlebach) to prevent this from happening again and to levy any and all appropriate penalties," Nixon said.

Muehlebach referred reporters to spokesman Don Landes, who declined to comment specifically on the allegations in the lawsuit. However, in a written statement, Landes said the funeral home did nothing wrong.

"Muehlebach has cooperated fully with all investigative authorities ... (and) regrets the attorney general has seen fit to file, in an election year, claims seeking an injunction to end a relationship which has already been terminated," Landes said. "Muehlebach Funeral Home will vigorously defend these claims."

St. Luke's "classified the material as 'anatomical waste,' which was confirmed by Muehlebach's inspection, and Muehlebach disposed of the material according to appropriate procedure," the statement said.

The funeral home had no contact with the families involved "and sincerely regrets the impact this unfortunate series of events has had on them," Landes said.

The Missouri Board of Embalmers and Funeral Directors is investigating.

All the incidents cited by Nixon occurred between February and July this year. Two civil lawsuits by parents also have been filed.

State health officials have cleared St. Luke's of wrongdoing, and Nixon said he concurred.

"It is our belief that Muehlebach is the violator," he said.

The hospital now is using another funeral home to cremate infant remains.

Espresso shows local art

R.J. DIEPENBROCK
staff reporter

Espresso Royale Caffe, widely known for its variety of coffee flavors and foods, is also a place where local artists can display their work.

Teresa Schmidt, assistant professor of art, has been arranging such displays of local artists for the past 10 years.

> "You need an audience, or the work isn't finished. We have a real community with Espresso as a hub."
> ● TERESA SCHMIDT
> ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF ART

These displays help to educate the community, Schmidt said.

Schmidt, an artist in her own right, has works showing at the Mulvane Arts Center in Topeka and has an upcoming show at the Manhattan Arts Center in September.

"The reason I've gone to all of this effort is that it's nice to see original works of art done by people still living," Schmidt said.

Espresso Royale is not an art gallery.

"A lot of people go in there that would not go into a gallery," said Gary Woodward, who has work displayed at Espresso Royale throughout August.

Schmidt said it was nice to have a place where people can congregate and show their work.

"You need an audience, or the work isn't finished," Schmidt said. "We have a real community with Espresso as a hub."

When looking for art to display, Schmidt said she looks for that which is genuine and authentic.

"Abstraction seems unusual, but it's the oldest form of art," Schmidt said.

Schmidt said the works that have been shown at Espresso Royale have ranged from very conservative to less common and abstract themes.

Some works are a mix, such as those done by Woodward, the former chairman of the K-State art department.

Woodward, whose work consists mostly of drawings, said while the subject matter is recognizable, the compositional matter is more abstract.

He also said the drawings are of places — cityscapes and landscapes — with people in them. But the focus is the places.

Woodward said he has been complimented on his work by people he sees around the city.

"I go to the store and have people mention my work," Woodward said.

Another local artist is Ann Carter, an instructor in K-State's English-language program. Her work was displayed in April.

"I've had a very good reception," Carter said, "lot of good comments."

Carter said her work is mostly silk screen and monoprint, figurative paintings, and prints that depict people.

Dear Cassie

by Cassandra Duveaux

Cassandra seeks letters to build student awareness

Good morning, K-Staters, and welcome (back) to Wildcat Land.

For those of you who don't know me, my name is Cassandra Duveaux, and I am the Collegian's very own advice columnist.

In the past I have helped students solve roommate squabbles and resolve their sexual frustrations, find that special someone and lose those extra pounds, pass their toughest classes and run away for the weekend.

I know Manhattan and K-State's campus like the back of my hand, and I have not yet been presented with a problem that I couldn't tackle.

You can find me in Tuesday Collegians this semester, but I need your help if I'm going to help you. I need your letters.

There are three ways to get a letter to Cassandra:

You can bring them to the Collegian newsroom in Kedzie 116. Because my correspondents are often anonymous, you need not sign your real name, and we will not check your K-State ID.

You can mail us a letter. Our address is Kansas State Collegian, Kedzie 116, Manhattan, Ks 66506

You can e-mail us at (collegn@ksu.edu).

Please address all letters to "Dear Cassandra," and let me know if you don't want your letter to run. I will assume all letters not marked private are meant to educate the campus as well as the writer.

Thank you again for letting me share my wisdom with you.

– Cassandra

Businesses spring up in Manhattan area

▪ Downtown gets bulk of new burst of local entrepreneurship.

RYAN O'HALLORAN
staff reporter

New businesses have been sprouting up in Manhattan lately.

Breadeaux' Pizza opened two months ago in the Village Plaza Shopping Center off Anderson Avenue.

"It's really good pizza — it's better than anyone else's pizza," Susan Maley, manager of Breadeaux' Pizza, said. "It's more like homemade pizza. We hand-toss it, throw it in the air."

> "It's more like homemade pizza. We hand-toss it, throw it in the air."
> • SUSAN MALEY
> MANAGER OF BREADEAUX PIZZA

The most popular item is the lunch buffet. The buffet is served from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. Sunday through Friday for $3.99. An average turnout for lunch is 40 people, with the number increasing on Fridays and Sundays.

"We have a lot of working people — Farm Bureau people and a lot of deliveries to Memorial Hospital," Maley said.

Customers have told Maley the crust is the best part of the pizza.

The owners of Breadeaux' Pizza, a chain of 84 restaurants in Iowa, Missouri and Kansas, had a restaurant in Manhattan until they moved it to Abilene eight years ago. Maley said they're interested in putting a second store in Manhattan near the mall.

Deborah Bishop, co-owner and manager of Coffee Stains Espresso, a new business in Westloop Shopping Center, said she was surprised by the July and August fall-off in business.

"I did not expect it to drop like it did," Bishop said. "In July and August, you know naturally it's going to drop, but not like this. It's basically that Manhattan shuts down, and I'm not used to that kind of lifestyle."

Coffee Stains opened in mid-April, and its location, tucked away beside Westloop Theatre, is hard to see.

"People don't seem to look. They just look at what's around them," said Bishop, who owns the shop with her husband, James Bishop. "They seem to focus in on one section."

The Bishops wanted to open their business at the First Bank Center on Claflin Avenue, but there was no space available at the time.

In an effort to drum up more business, Coffee Stains will begin to serve lunch Sept. 3.

"We'll be serving hot roast beef and pastrami sandwiches and a soup of the day," Bishop said. "That will help."

Clinton wants handgun ban

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Clinton, promising a convention-week blitz of new initiatives, might propose a ban on handgun purchases by people convicted of domestic abuse, a Democratic official said.

Clinton will unveil the plan during his train trip through the Midwest this week while convention delegates gather in Chicago. The official, speaking by telephone in Chicago, said:

- A new education proposal, aimed at reducing illiteracy, will be announced Tuesday.
- An environmental initiative will be unveiled Wednesday.
- During his acceptance speech Thursday, the president will present a host of other plans, including a jobs proposal aimed at helping poor Americans pinched by the new welfare law.

The official said Clinton has settled on a tax break or incentive for employers who hire welfare recipients.

The gun proposal builds on the Brady bill, which requires a five-day waiting period for the purchase of handguns. The bill has earned Clinton enemies, particularly in the South and among National Rifle Association supporters.

But the Brady bill and a Clinton-backed ban on certain assault weapons bolstered the president's anti-crime portfolio.

His political team believes the initiatives have helped Clinton seize the traditionally Republican crime issue.

Banning the purchase of guns by people convicted of domestic abuse fits Clinton's strategy to appeal to women voters, a potential swing voting bloc in November's election.

The White House also said it hopes the gun initative blunts rival Bob Dole's criticism of Clinton's anti-drug record.

Dole was attending a GOP picnic Sunday in suburban Chicago to outline a new anti-drug plan and cast Clinton as negligent in the fight to keep children off drugs.

News of the ban was first reported in the New York Times after aides sought a high-profile outlet to leak the initiative before the convention in hopes of maximum press coverage.

California to OK chemical castration

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Child molesters could be given drugs to stifle their sex drives, and repeat offenders would automatically face "chemical castration" under a bill Gov. Pete Wilson has vowed to sign into law.

"Hopefully this treatment will help in the difficult struggle to control the deviant behavior of those who stalk our young," Wilson told the New York Times on Monday.

Legislation passed by the state Senate last week would allow courts to make first-time child molesters take hormone-suppressing drugs when paroled from prison.

The drug treatment would be mandatory for a second offense. The bill does not actually require emasculation, though a molester could choose physical castration instead of the drug treatment intended to lower testosterone levels.

"This is a treatment that in Europe has produced a dramatic drop in recidivism," state Sen. Ross Johnson said.

The issue has raised medical ethics questions, with legal experts predicting court challenges should the bill become law.

"There are problems regarding the right to privacy, the right to procreate, the right to exercise control over one's body," said Valerie Small Navarro, a lobbyist with the California branch of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Other states have tried to toughen their child-molestation laws, but only in California has such legislation advanced so far, the Times reported. The measure could be approved and sent to Wilson this week.

Its sponsor, Assembleyman Bill Hoge, said the issue was brought to his attention in April when convicted child molester Larry Don McQuay was paroled in Texas.

McQuay has said he would probably molest again if he were not physically castrated.

Crimestoppers catches Union bomb-hoax suspect

SARAH LUNDAY
senior staff writer

The juvenile male who phoned the K-State Student Union and Ramada Inn last week was trying to stifle a laugh when he told employees that each building had a bomb planted inside.

He's not laughing anymore.

The unnamed juvenile, who is 13 years old, will face two charges of criminal threat, Riley County Police Lt. Herb Crosby said.

Because the offender is a juvenile, the Riley County Police Department cannot release the suspect's name or previous criminal record, Crosby said.

The suspect was caught by Crimestoppers, a statewide campaign for citizens to report criminals.

Someone who knew the juvenile called to report him as a suspect, and after RCPD questioned him, it pressed charges, Crosby said.

A recent bombing at the Olympic Games and another possible bombing on the TWA flight to Paris have caused people everywhere to be edgy about the possibility of a bomb, K-State Police investigator Richard Herrman said.

Although the caller was stifling a laugh when he phoned the Union, Herrman said the building was still evacuated for 20 minutes, and all doors were locked.

"We can't take the chance that it was a real call," Herrman said. "With the recent bombing threats, bombs are taken more seriously."

Law enforcement nationwide is focusing on identifying bombers, Crosby said.

"And I think prosecutors are going to show that when you do get caught they are going to be pretty strict with you," he said.

To report a crime
If you or anyone you know has information on a suspect or a crime, call Crimestoppers at 539-7777.
You can also call 911.

In K-State history, the Union and Anderson Hall have been popular places for prank callers to phone in bomb threats. Carrie Mitchell, operations manager at the K-State Union Bookstore, said there was only a few bomb threats last year.

Last week's bomb threat hit during one of the busiest times of the year. When the call came in, Mitchell said, the bookstore had a good idea that it was probably a false alarm, but it couldn't take any chances.

"You think it's a prank, but you look at all your customers, and you have to take it seriously," Mitchell said.

Memorial service planned to provide closure in MCC students' deaths

JILL STORY
contributing writer

Manhattan Christian College has an enrollment of around 350. The students will tell you that the death of a student is equivalent to the loss of a member of the family. This summer they lost three of their own.

MCC students Yvonne Kafka of Goodland; Scott Thomson of Vista, Calif.; and Matthew Glenn of Norton died from injuries sustained in a one-vehicle accident in the early-morning hours of July 27. A fourth student, Maya Needham of Garden City, survived.

"The four students made up one of three camp teams who had been traveling through the Midwest, ministering to youth at camps and conferences," said Laurin Hill, MCC director of alumni and public relations.

According to reports from the New Mexico state police, the 1995 Ford van was traveling westbound on Interstate 40 between Tucumcari, N.M., and Albuquerque, N.M., when it swerved into oncoming traffic. The driver over-corrected, and the vehicle rolled about five times before coming to rest on its tires.

Kafka and Thomson died shortly after the accident. Glenn was in critical condition at University Health and Science Medical Center in Albuquerque until his death Aug. 6 from organ failure.

Needham was recently released from the hospital after undergoing skin grafts for her road-burn injuries. She plans to return to MCC for her junior year this fall.

Glenn and Kafka would have been sophomores this year. Thomson would have been a junior. All of the team members were involved in MCC activities. With such a small student body, few lives are unaffected by the accident's aftermath.

"It's taking some students longer to grieve than others, but I've noticed that it has had a really unifying effect among the students. There's a lot of support," said MCC senior Eric Aufdengarten.

Hill said response from Christian colleges, churches and concerned people was immediate and overwhelming.

"We received an outpouring of support right from the start. The calls began as soon as the office opened on the Monday morning after the accident. The amount of support the school has received has been tremendous," Hill said.

MCC has planned a memorial service for Kafka, Thomson and Glenn at All Faiths Chapel tonight at 7 p.m. for Kafka, Thomson and Glenn.

Hillary Clinton takes podium, draws criticism

CHICAGO (AP) — A liberal lightning rod to her critics, a progressive patron saint to her supporters, Hillary Clinton took center stage Tuesday night at the Democratic National Convention.

Love her. Loathe her. Most Americans have a strong opinion about her, and the first lady had much at stake in this 15-minute speech.

Inside
Students have the opportunity to make a difference this election season by joining various campus political organizations or interning with various political parties.
● Pages 3 & 5

In the evening's crescendo, aides said the first lady would talk about families, including her own, and the clear choice between her husband and Bob Dole.

"This is a very important message for her," said Neel Lattimore, an aide to Hillary Clinton. "It will reflect all the issues like families and children that she has always addressed in her work."

Presidental spokesman Mike McCurry said the president spoke to the first lady several times and was eager for his wife's speech.

Comparison to Elizabeth Dole may be unavoidable. The Republican nominee's wife won rave reviews for a dramatic Oprah-style walkabout among GOP delegates just two weeks ago.

Few first ladies have divided public opinion quite like Hillary Clinton, who grew up in Park Ridge, Ill., a Chicago suburb.

Recent polls indicate there are few fence-sitters when it comes to the president's wife.

In one poll, 47 percent of respondents gave her a thumbs-up on her influence on the Clinton administration while the same number had a negative view of her. Only 3 percent had no opinion of her.

In another poll, just 7 percent of those questioned said they had not heard enough about Hillary Clinton to have an opinion. The same poll showed 36 percent hadn't heard enough to have an opinion about Elizabeth Dole, a two-time Cabinet secretary for Republican presidents.

Despite her high negatives, Democrats aren't hiding her from the public as the Republicans did with their resident villain, House Speaker Newt Gingrich. The GOP virtually eliminated Gingrich from its national convention in San Diego, limiting him to a short, feel-good speech out of prime time.

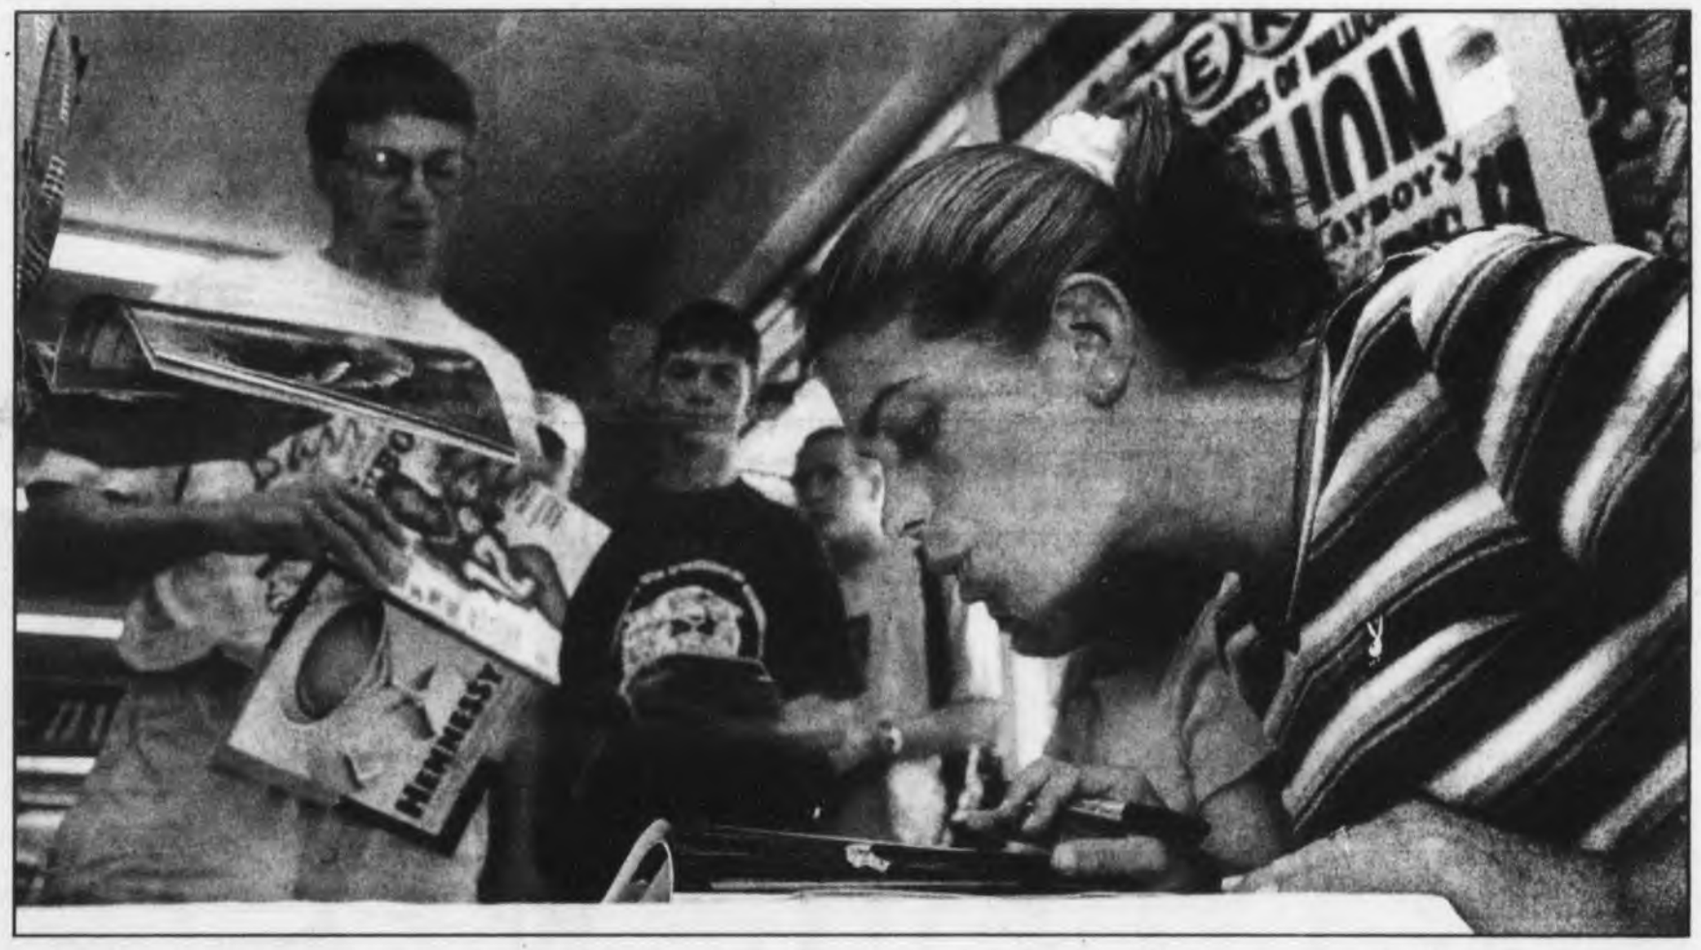
Pool-cue theft ends with chase, arrest

BREE BISNETTE
staff reporter

A bar incident led to an arrest on the K-State campus in the early-morning hours Tuesday.

A quick escape from Fast Eddy's was made around midnight Tuesday by Korey Krus, a Manhattan resident, after he allegedly stole two pool cues from a patron at the bar and pool hall. When asked to return them, he fled out of Aggieville and onto the K-State campus, said Sharon Gilman, the assistant manager of Fast Eddy's.



"There was something that happened previously between the two. (Krus) came in and saw the guy's cues, took them and ran out the door," Gilman said. "He came back later, and we asked him to return them, and he refused and ran."

Krus was chased by a bartender onto campus, where he was apprehended by the K-State Police Department in the K-State Student Union parking lot at 12:24 a.m. He was then arrested by the Riley County Police Department.

"Just an old debt from a pool game," Gilman said. "He just wanted his money, and the guy didn't have it. If you can't pay, don't play."

The pool cues were not recovered, and the loss was estimated at $1,900. Krus was released from the RCPD on $1,500 bond.

AMY STEWART, sophomore in pre-health professions and collegiate Playboy bunny, dries an autographed copy of Playboy magazine's Girls of the Big 12 edition with her breath Tuesday afternoon at Dara's Fast Lane on Claflin Road. Stewart, who posed nude for the magazine along with Bailey Lynn, sophomore in nutrition and exercise sciences, said she would do it all over again if the opportunity arose.

Playboy Big 12 autograph signings draw large crowds to area business

K-State's own Playboy bunnies had people lining up around the corner of Dara's Fast Lane yesterday afternoon.

Amy Stewart, sophomore in pre-health professions, and Bailey Lynn, sophomore in nutrition and exercise science, signed autographs at Shop Quik from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m., Dara's from 3 to 4:30 p.m., and Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon from 6 to 8 p.m.

The sophomores are the only two K-State women featured in the Girls of the Big 12 pictorial of Playboy's October issue. Chris Canty, senior cornerback, appeared in the issue as part of Playboy's 1996 all-America football team.

"It has been fun, but I am also tired," Stewart said.

The signing session at Dara's went 20 minutes over schedule. Both girls said their hands ached from writing all day long, but they had enjoyed the popularity.

They also remembered some of the more interesting people who had asked them for their autographs.

"This one guy had drawn pictures of Playboy covers, and he had us sign a Lego box. The pictures were of Bill Clinton and something else, nothing to do with us," Stewart said. "He was the first person at Dara's. He had been waiting for half an hour before we even got here."

Dara's also enjoyed the popularity. In the hour and 45 minutes the two girls were there, Dara's sold over 250 magazines.

Stewart and Lynn said that most people had been supportive of their choice to pose in Playboy.

"All my friends think it is cool," Stewart said. "It took my parents a while, but they are okay with it now."

Lynn, on the other hand, had the same reaction from friends but had decided not to tell her parents.

DAN CROSBY, freshman in criminal justice, waits with other autograph-seekers while holding his copies of Playboy magazine's "Girls of the Big 12" edition Tuesday afternoon at Dara's Fast Lane on Claflin Road. Dara's sold nearly 250 copies of the Big 12 edition for the autograph signing.

"I'm afraid of what my dad would say, but if my parents find out, it's okay. I am old enough to do what I want," she said.

Lynn did receive support from her two roommates, both of which are men. Jeremy Taylor, freshman in biology, said he did not have a problem with Lynn's appearance in Playboy because the two had been friends for years.

His friends, on the other hand, appreciated it more.

"All my friends know Bailey is my roommate. The male ones think it's pretty cool," Taylor said.

"The female ones, like my girlfriend, kind of have a problem with it. Mainly just because a Playboy bunny sleeps in the room across the hall from me," he said.

Even though most students' reactions were positive, both models said they would have posed anyway because of how easy the Playboy people made it.

"They make you feel really comfortable. It was more comfortable having someone there to talk to though," Lynn said.

Neither Lynn nor Stewart claimed to have had a problem with the shoot other than its being tiring.

"We checked into the hotel about 8 that morning and left around 10 that night. We were really sore afterwards," Stewart said.

"You wouldn't think it would be hard standing there staring at a camera but they were consistently saying 'suck it in, arch your back.'"

The only problem Lynn thought she would have was that the shoot was being done outdoors on private land.

"It sounded bizarre but once we got out there it went fine. We went out in loose clothes so we could change them quicker," Lynn said. "It was only the photographer, make-up person and us. It wasn't like there were a bunch of people in the trees staring at us."

Filling dean's position might take some time

TARA WRAY
staff writer

The position of assistant dean of student life has been vacant since Bernard Franklin left the job last July, and finding his replacement might be months away.

Carla Jones, associate dean of student life, said as of now they are not close to finding a suitable replacement for Franklin.

"We are looking for someone who has experience in higher education and student affairs," Jones said. "A master's degree is required."

Jones said it could be as late as mid-semester before the search yields a new assistant dean, and that leaves Jones, along with Associate Dean Susan Scott, in charge of office functions.

Those functions, which include crisis management and intervention and helping to advise the Office of Student Activities and Services, have been updated and redesigned for the new assistant dean of student life.

The main responsibilities of the new dean will remain the same to provide beneficial services for students, but the job description has changed since Franklin left.

"The duties as they stand now are being redesigned," Jones said. "The job has been redesigned."

Jones said the nationwide search for Franklin's replacement hit an unexpected snag last July when a candidate was selected to take over the position, then reneged the already-given acceptance two days later.

University Counseling Services, which works closely with the Office of the Assistant Dean of Student Life in consultation and referrals for crisis management, has not been affected by the lack of a new assistant dean yet.

Dorinda Lambert, assistant director for clinical services at University Counseling, said it's too soon to tell whether the lack of an assistant dean will affect University Counseling.

"There is the ideal world, and then there is the real world," she said. "We have to figure out how to work with fewer staff."

Lambert said even though the Office of the Assistant Dean of Student Life is short-staffed, it is important for students to realize that crisis management and intervention services are still available to them at University Counseling.

Student voices heard in politics

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

As election time draws near, many students might find it very easy to shrug off the issues and rely on others to cast the votes. However, there are several students and alumni involved in politics who make their voice heard in government.

Amy Smith, a 1994 political science graduate, works as a legislative correspondent for temporary senator Sheila Frahm in Washington, D.C. Smith's job entails researching topics and drafting responses to constituents' letters.

The political scene is not a foreign place for Smith. She served as an intern in the U.S. Senate for two sessions. She also worked in former Kansas senator Bob Dole's office during the summer of 1993.

Smith stressed that anyone can apply for internships or get involved in government. She recommended looking into local city councils as well as on-campus student organizations.

"It (was) a wonderful experience," Smith said. "I now know the Kansas political scene."

Maggie Keating, sophomore in political science, got a firsthand look at the national political scene this week. She worked as a volunteer for the Women's Leadership Forum of the Democratic National Committee at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

Keating noticed that many students are apathetic when it comes to politics and government in general. She said she feels this stems from the fact that political issues aren't that interesting to most students unless they can see the clear-cut impact politics have on them.

There should be a lot more education about politics, she said.

"Students can and do make a difference," Keating said.

Margery Ambrosius, associate professor in political science, said she agrees.

"I'm not sure that we do a good job (of teaching politics) in public schools as we once did," she said.

Ambrosius said there is apathy among students, and students should take their own initiative to get involved with the government.

Students need to realize they don't always have to be political science majors to get involved, Ambrosius said. Ambrosius suggests that students contact parties at the county or state level, or contact people in charge of campaigns. The political science department can also be used as a stepping stone.

With the general election coming up in November, there has been a collage of information thrown at you about the various candidates and issues.

Don't know who to vote for yet? Or maybe you know who you want to vote for, but you need to know more.

No matter what stage you're at in your political awareness, now would be an ideal time to get involved with campus politics.

Some of the political organizations on campus, such as the Young Democrats and College Republicans, work on the campaigns of their respective candidates.

You too can help Bill, Bob or whomever get elected.

But if campaigning isn't your thing, you should still know what's going on, what the issues are and what the candidates' positions are. The Collegian has comprehensive election coverage for several significant races. Read up.

You need to know who and what you're voting for.

Speaking of voting, are you even registered?

If not, you need to hurry up and do so. The deadline to vote in the November election is Oct. 21.

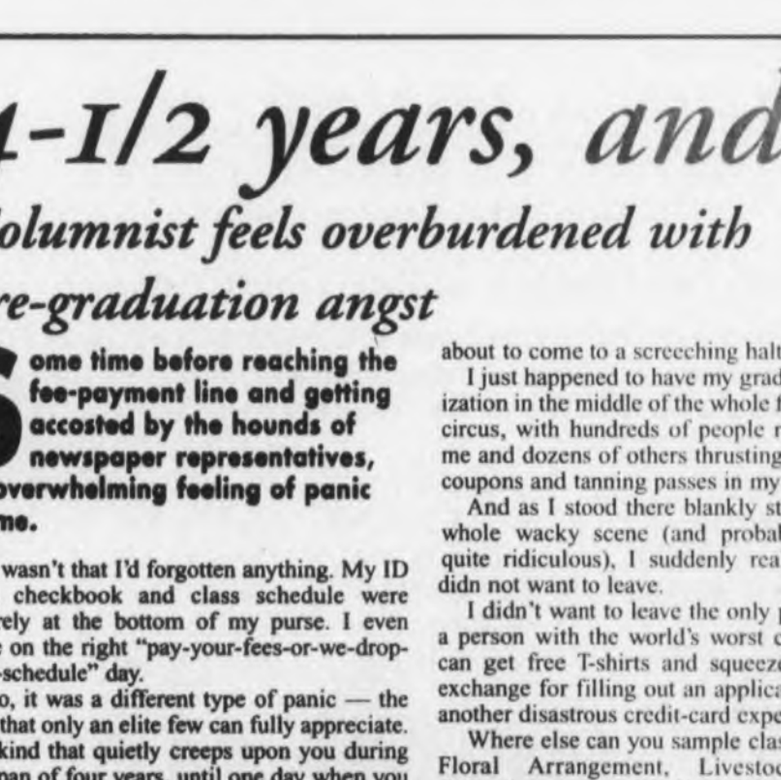
Voters who have registered to vote in Riley County before but now live at a different address may go to the voting booth designated for their new address and fill out a form on election day.

Voters who have not registered in the past can register at the county clerk's office, the Department of Motor Vehicles or the public library.

Don't have a car to get to any of those places? Well, that's not a good enough excuse.

You can also register at the Office of Student Activities and Services on the bottom floor of the K-State Student Union.

If you think your vote is unnecessary because the election has little or no effect on your life, you're wrong. Very wrong.



Do you get financial aid? Do you have a minimum-wage job? Do you pay taxes? Are you in the military?

The person you vote for could, and probably will, have a significant effect on all those issues and then some.

So get involved, or don't complain.

WHY WE CARE

With the general election's campaigns in full swing, students have been given the perfect opportunity to get politically involved.

McCain season sure to be memorable

MY

Russell FORTMEYER

Those in the know don't wait in lines for bad seats on the 250th yard line.

Especially when they can flip on the tube and get a front-row seat.

Instead, they go to McCain Auditorium and queue up for the real hot tickets in town — the McCain Performance Series.

Many times, the shows and productions are so great you begin to wonder if you're really in Kansas or in a theater off Times Square.

Coming off the heels of its 25th anniversary, McCain's 1996-97 season promises to deliver some memorable, and perhaps avoidable, experiences.

Always popular with the local crowd, opera will be incarnated on stage Oct. 17 with the timeless Rossini opera, "The Barber of Seville." (Yeah, yeah, it is a Thursday night, but you'll never see "Friends" star Jennifer Aniston sing "Figaro" on the show.)

Getting good tickets the week-of for operas in this town is almost as hard as getting your money's worth buying textbooks.

Also in the vein of classical music, the superb violinist Midori makes a visit on Nov. 1.

It might be hard to see this on Friday and then see the next McCain event on Sunday, but make time because ... .

Every season, an event comes along that sounds awkward, maybe even a little too exotic for the upper Flint Hills audience.

This year, my money is on the Nov. 3 performance of the Tibetan Song and Dance Ensemble — performing in the United States for the first time.

Trust me, you'd never think of seeing something like this if you lived in New York, but you do not want to miss this, because you will never forget it.

Making strange bedfellows for the first time in recent memory, the K-State theater department has scheduled to produce the hippie musical "Hair" very close to McCain's touring production of The Who's rocky-rolly, pinball-wizard show "Tommy."

Should I go to both?

Well, Tommy's got music by The Who. But I've heard "Hair" will include some free-spirited nude scenes.

You can see the dilemma I'm in. However, musical theater is always a big success, so maybe I'd better get my tickets for both.

Not part of the official season ticketed subscription series, but also not to be missed, the Count Basie Orchestra will be back in Manhattan on Feb. 1 after last year's hugely successful concert here.

> Coming off the heels of its 25th Anniversary, McCain's 1996-97 season promises to deliver some memorable, and perhaps avoidable experiences.

Last year's concert was considered by some to be the highlight of the cultural season, so this insider secret will surely not stay so secret this time around.

The Basie band is back again as part of the K-State Jazz Festival, but you'll be able to buy individual tickets to this and all the other shows beginning Sept. 3.

If you want to see how far a celebrity can sink (even lower than infomercials!), don't think twice about seeing Jamie Farr (M*A*S*H*'s Klinger) and William Christopher (M*A*S*H*'s Father Mulcahey) in Neil Simon's "The Odd Couple."

Jamie Farr? He couldn't even keep his job on the Gong Show. What, was John Ritter too busy?

And speaking of Simon, in the past two seasons we've had "Laughter on the 23rd Floor" and "Lost in Yonkers."

Is there another living American playwright in the house?

Geez!

Most surprising, depending on who you're talking to, is the inclusion of more family-aimed events than ever before.

Three productions alone will no doubt appeal to the Disney-reared child: the play "Pocahontas" (it surely cannot be as bad as the cartoon movie), the ice ballet "The Sleeping Beauty" (ice in McCain? It might be worth checking out), and a sign-language-and-words play of A.A. Milne's "Winnie-the-Pooh."

Rounding out the season is the first-up-to-bat Reduced Shakespeare Company's surely funny rift on the Bible (Sept. 27). The group will also perform an offbeat production of "Romeo and Juliet" (Oct. 11).

There are other worthy events, but hey, you can check them out when you buy your tickets.

You can buy these individual tickets or a K-State student series ticket for $87, but you sit in the upper balcony, commonly referred to as the nosebleed section.

This can really be a disadvantage for some of the larger productions (the opera, any musicals), because the stage is cropped and some traveling companies' sound systems don't quite travel that far up.

However, many times the smaller events don't require the balcony to be opened, and you'll get bumped up to the orchestra-level seating.

If you are still not convinced to buy tickets to McCain or a K-State Theatre event, remember that after you scoot on out of this university, these kinds of deals won't follow you around for the rest of your life.

Once you're no longer classified as a student, you'll end up paying loads more for the same experience — and good luck finding a subscription series this interesting and convenient.

Or it could end up even worse. You could be Jamie Farr's understudy.

Columnist feels overburdened with pre-graduation angst

MY VIEW

Nikola Maria ZYTKOW

Some time before reaching the fee-payment line and getting accosted by the hounds of newspaper representatives, an overwhelming feeling of panic hit me.

It wasn't that I'd forgotten anything. My ID card, checkbook and class schedule were securely at the bottom of my purse. I even came on the right "pay-your-fees-or-we-drop-your-schedule" day.

No, it was a different type of panic — the kind that only an elite few can fully appreciate. The kind that quietly creeps upon you during the span of four years, until one day when you realize that you are only seven hours away from graduating and that life as you know it is about to come to a screeching halt.

I just happened to have my graduation realization in the middle of the whole fee-payment circus, with hundreds of people rushing past me and dozens of others thrusting hamburger coupons and tanning passes in my face.

And as I stood there blankly staring at the whole wacky scene (and probably looking quite ridiculous), I suddenly realized that I didn not want to leave.

I didn't want to leave the only place where a person with the world's worst credit rating can get free T-shirts and squeeze bottles in exchange for filling out an application for yet another disastrous credit-card experience.

Where else can you sample classes such as Floral Arrangement, Livestock Semen Collection, or You and Your Sexuality? What other place offers the opportunity to take square-dancing lessons, listen to a Stephen King lecture and join the Society for Creative Anachronism, a group that dresses up in medieval clothing and recreates the daily life of that time period?

College is truly the ultimate social experience — a time to experiment, to get a belly-button ring, go to an opera or test the Guinness Book of World Records on how many days a human can really function without sleep. It's a time to go to Padre for spring break, to watch all of the independent grade-B flicks your heart desires and to partake in the largest dating pool in 44,650,000 square feet.

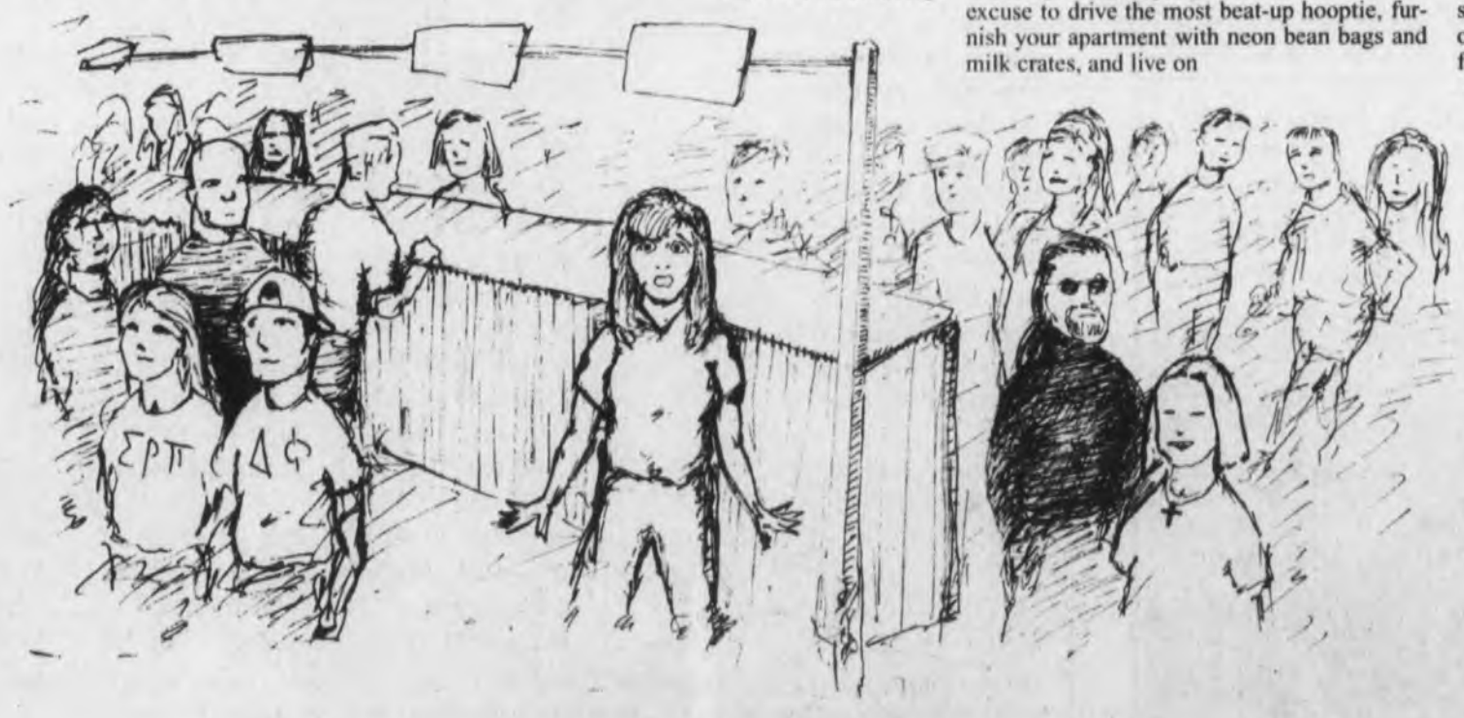
It's a mini-window to the world — a place that brings you face-to-face with the ideologies of Ross Perot, Jesse Jackson, Bobby Seale and Henry Kissinger. It bombards you with different viewpoints on religion, abortion and interracial relationships.

Being in college gives you the greatest excuse to drive the most beat-up hooptie, furnish your apartment with neon bean bags and milk crates, and live on ramen noodles and stale pizza. After all, you have the satisfaction of knowing that it's only temporary.

In college, the old high-school cliques and in-groups nearly vanish. Everyone fits in somewhere. You can join a fraternity or sorority, become part of the turtleneck-wearing, cigar-smoking, coffeehouse crowd or hang with the residence-hall lobby loungers.

The more I thought of all of the opportunities, the more nostalgic I got about my last semester, and the louder that little voice in my head got. Maybe I could stay a little longer and somehow stretch those seven hours into two semesters.

Others have done it. So what if people sometimes scoff at these career students, calling them drifters, slackers and everything else? For the first time in my life, I could relate to the mentality of these scholastic veterans — the ones that after obtaining four undergraduate degrees could easily recite the names of every bar that has lived and died in Aggieville in the last 10 years.



> I didn't want to leave the only place where the person with the world's worst credit rating can get free T-shirts and sqeeze bottles in exchange for filling out an application for yet another disastrous credit-card experience.

As I stood in line waiting to sign that final fee-payment check, I spotted a friend in the crowd and shared my thoughts with him.

"You're experiencing a perfectly normal reaction of a person who's spent their whole life in the educational system and is about to be kicked headfirst out of that system," he assured me.

Still, we agreed there really should be a support group for seniors about to graduate. Hey, don't laugh. There are support groups for all sorts of other life-altering changes such as death, marriage, divorce, even menopause. So why not graduation?

On-campus political groups work to clarify voter issues

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

As election day nears, campus political groups are helping candidates campaign to increase student voter awareness.

Three political groups involved on campus are the College Republicans, Young Democrats and Students for Peace and Justice. The College Republicans and the Young Democrats have similar interests within their respective parties.

"The two groups are very similar," Michael Oldfather, Young Democrats adviser, said.

The purpose of these student organizations is to provide accurate information on a number of political issues. According to Hermann Donnert, College Republican adviser, several hundred students meet regularly to discuss issues and candidates.

They also stuff information packets from candidates requesting campaign assistance. Then members distribute the information to the public.

ONE VOICE ★ ONE VOTE

Interested in the upcoming elections? The Collegian keeps track of its Election '96 articles on the Web at (http://collegian.ksu.edu).

The Young Democrats are also actively involved in campaigning. Members help organize debates and help with voter registration. This gives students a chance to work out and meet the candidates.

The Students for Peace and Justice also conduct voter-registration drives.

"It's targeted to lower-income neighborhoods," Lach Franquemont, the group's president, said. "They're the least registered to vote."

The group also raises funds and awareness for humanitarian causes.

Anyone interested in joining these organizations should watch for signs with meeting times and dates.

Pass or fail ...
K-State's first test

■ For the first time in K-State history, the season opener will be played against a conference opponent. Can the Wildcats stay afloat when the grade cards come in?

TODD STEWART
sports writer

Ten wins and a bowl victory. And still it is not enough.

"Everyone wants to be No. 1," K-State junior cornerback Demetric Denmark said. "I think it's realistic."

And the Wildcats will know exactly where it stands right from the get-go, opening their season Saturday against Texas Tech in the inaugural Big 12 Conference game.

"We can see where we are early in the season," senior free safety Mario Smith said. "The tempo is up. Players are upbeat."

Coach Bill Snyder said he could feel the change in atmosphere.

"I think there's a real sense of anticipation," Snyder said.

"People are anxious and excited to get it started, and our players are the same way."

Holding back some of that excitement might be the injuries to cornerback Joe Gordon and running back Eric Hickson, but senior quarterback Brian Kavanagh said the team is confident.

"I'm not nervous at all about this season," Kavanagh said. "I just can't wait for Saturday."

It might not be the same for Texas Tech coach Spike Dykes, who said despite his team's recent success, he knows his team is in for a rough go-around.

"We had a pretty good year, but we didn't compare to what K-State did last year," Dykes said. "They're a great team."

Snyder said playing a team like Texas Tech to open the season was not the type of scheduling he's been accustomed to, but his team will have to be ready.

The Wildcats have traditionally opened the season with a non-conference opponent, allowing the team to ease itself into tougher conference action.

This season will be the first time in K-State history the Cats open with a conference opponent.

"It doesn't fit our scheduling philosophy," Snyder said, "but we can't hold anything back."

Snyder was not the only one to dislike the schedule. Dykes said he wasn't a big fan of the scheduling, especially after K-State passed on Texas A&M to open the season, and instead opted for Texas Tech.

"I guess we drew the straw," Dykes said.

Snyder said the decision of Texas Tech over Texas A&M boiled down to a home-field advantage.

"The difference is College Station and Manhattan," Snyder said. "If you're from Manhattan, you better choose Manhattan."

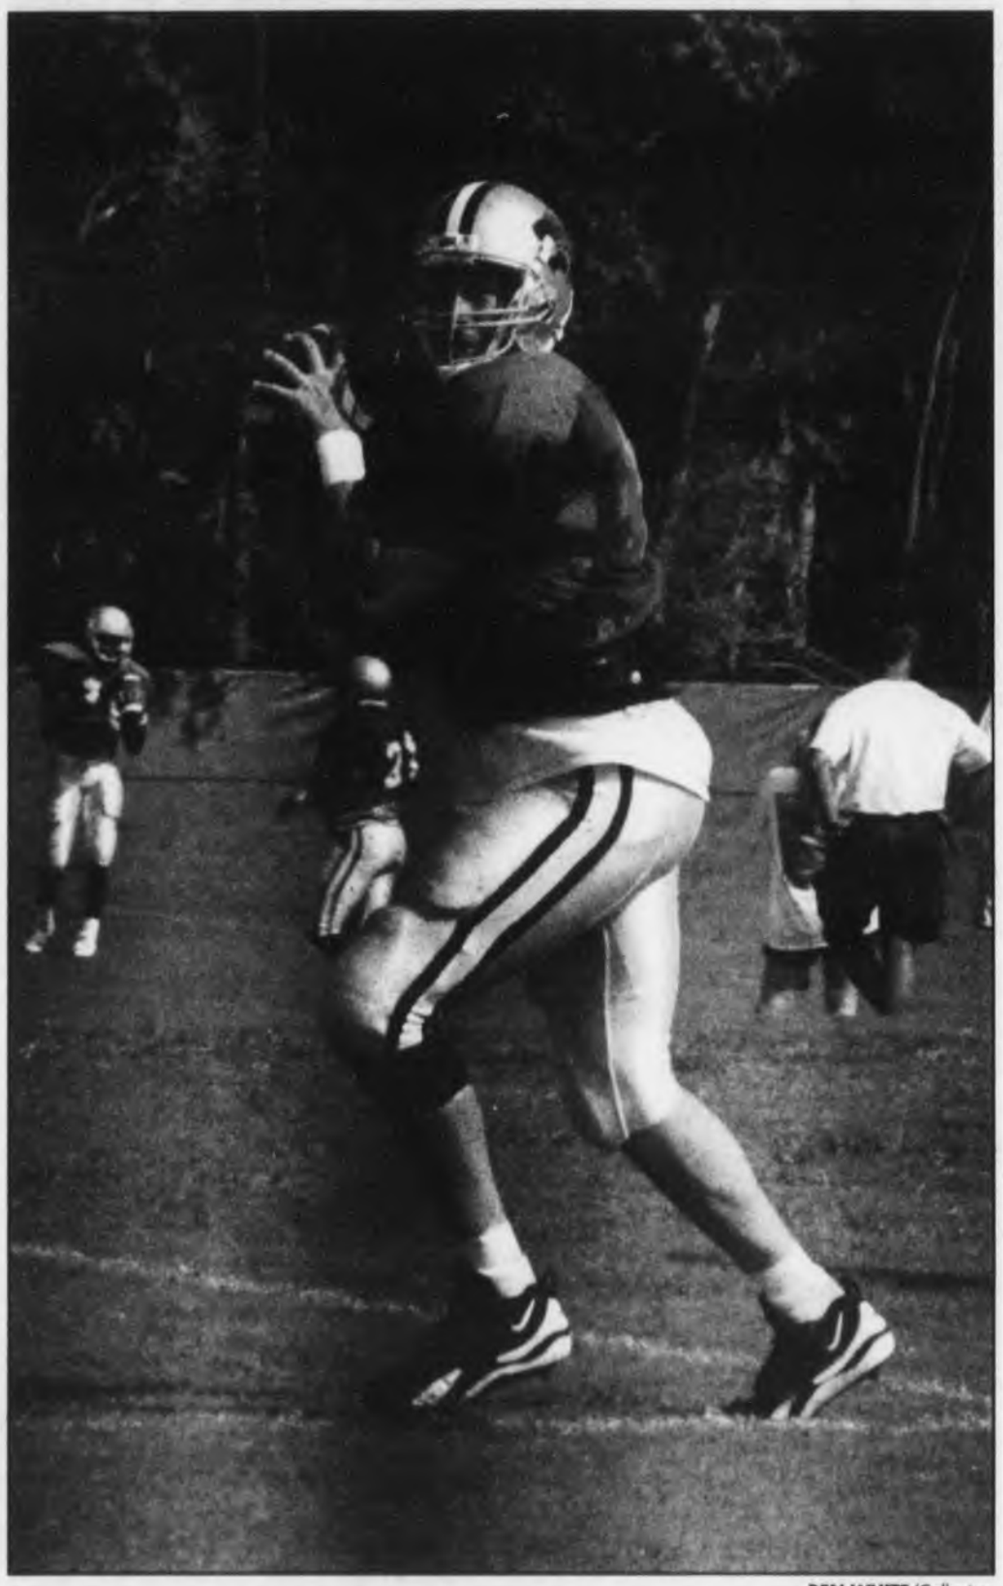
He said in no way was he trying to dodge Texas A&M.

"My recollection is Texas Tech beat Texas A&M," Snyder said. "It had nothing to do with playing Texas Tech or Texas A&M."

Either way, two K-State players have caught Dykes' eye.

Dykes said junior all-America cornerback Chris Canty and senior wide receiver Kevin Lockett were maybe two of the best players he had seen.

"I don't know if we'll see two better players," Dykes said.



"Canty is as good a corner I've seen in I don't know when. Kevin Lockett is the best wide receiver we've faced in several years."

Lockett, however, plans to use motivation other than beating Texas Tech in Saturday's big game.

The last time the Cats took the field at KSU Stadium, Colorado pulled out a 27-17 heartbreaking win, dashing K-State's Cotton Bowl hopes. Lockett said he is using that game as motivation for Texas Tech.

"It sticks with me all the time," Lockett said.

"We should have a little motivation to win. No one likes to lose at home."

BEN WHITE/Collegian

BRIAN KAVANAGH, K-State quarterback, gears up during practice Tuesday for Saturday's game against Texas Tech. The game will be the Cats' first season opener against a Conference opponent.

Injury vaults Lawrence into spotlight

BRENT STOVER
contributing writer

When he found out that good friend and fellow running back Eric Hickson went down with a broken left leg in practice Aug. 21, emotions got the best of Mike Lawrence.

"I just broke down in tears, started crying, went over by his side," Lawrence said.

Hickson's injury might have provided Lawrence with the inspiration to reach his goal of breaking K-State's single season rushing record of 1,137 yards.

"He told me to go out there and do what I need to do," Lawrence said. "He's with me every step of the way."

The fact that Hickson is out for the season means that Lawrence has become the No. 1 running back. The two split time at the position last year.

"I'm playing for the both of us now. I have him in my heart, and I know I can get the job done," Lawrence said.

After leading K-State in rushing last season, Hickson was expected to start against Texas Tech. With the injury to Hickson, Lawrence has been thrust into the starting role after four starts last season. He rushed for 599 yards on 143 carries in 1995.

"Now I feel as though this is my opportunity to do what I need to do," Lawrence said. "I won't approach it any differently because of the simple fact that Eric's always with me."

Lawrence, who said he feels he is a much-improved back over last year, will run the ball differently than he has in the past.

After being a slash-and-run back last year, Lawrence said he plans to combine everything this year.

"I'm going to make you miss or run you over this year," Lawrence said. "It's a whole different approach to everything."

Even with the loss of Hickson, the Cats still plan to split time between two running backs. That means sophomore Marlon Charles, who rushed for 114 yards in the spring game, will see added duty.

"He (Charles) knows what he needs to do," Lawrence said. "He's very focused on what he needs to do to achieve his goals."

K-State coach Bill Snyder plans to use both Lawrence and Charles, instead of featuring one back over the other.

"Like last year, with Eric and Mike, it's who gets the hot hand — who's running the ball well," Snyder said.

To put it simply, Hickson's misfortune might provide others with a chance to shine.

Cats must be ready for toughest season opener in history

About 72 hours from now, 42,000-plus fans will be filtering into KSU Stadium to watch the first-ever Big 12 Conference match-up.

What makes this game even more historic is the fact that for the first time in its history, K-State will open a season against a conference opponent. Did you read that? First time ever. There is no Temple this year. There will be no opportunity for learning how to walk before meeting a conference foe. Texas Tech is on its way here.

MY

Shana NEWELL

The Cats will have to be ready. Lord knows the fans are.

So what should fans expect Saturday?

A fight. Both teams have just recently begun to turn themselves into perennially legitimate programs. Texas Tech has had five bowl appearances since 1986, and, like K-State, is trying to keep a streak of three alive.

But both schools need to get over the hump. K-State has been overlooked by Nebraska and Colorado so many times they should be getting tired of it. On the same note, Texas Tech continues to play second fiddle to Texas. Now both teams want to make a statement, and fast.

A good way to start is to win the first-ever Big 12 game. If Kansas loses tomorrow night, an event I am sure will happen, each team not only has the opportunity to win the inaugural Big 12 match-up, but it will also earn the honors to be the first Big 12 team to win, period.

So let's take a look at what should happen Saturday.

WHEN K-STATE HAS THE BALL:

Quarterback Brian Kavanagh, after four seasons of riding the bench, gets his first career start. But don't expect Kav to start passing on the first snap. Snyder will want to establish a running game right away.

Last season, the only two teams to take away K-State's running game, Nebraska and Colorado, were also the only two teams to defeat the Cats. It's imperative for running backs Mike Lawrence and Marlon Charles to get through the Red Raiders' defense. But they'll need help. K-State's offensive line, led by center Jason Johnson, will need to open alleys for the ball carriers on every play.

Texas Tech, on the other hand, needs to find a way to put pressure on Kavanagh. Watch defensive end Montea Reagor. Texas Tech has a tough, blitzing defense and Kavanagh is going to need protection.

When Kavanagh does pass the ball, look for big gains by the Cats. Tech's secondary is young and inexperienced. Wide receivers Kevin Lockett and Jimmy Dean (and an occasional appearance by Chris Canty) are sure to burn Tech's defensive backfield.

WHEN TEXAS TECH HAS THE BALL:

If K-State's defense is not careful, the Cats' offense might be knocked out early in the game. Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge (don't forget to bring your Little Zebbie cream pies) and running back Byron Hanspard are a one-two punch waiting to happen.

Coach Bill Snyder said Lethridge is a lot like former Nebraska star Tommie Frazier — he can make things happen. Lethridge will scramble, he'll throw with accuracy; in essence, he'll make the play.

Hanspard was the Southwest Conference's leading rusher last season. Nothing says he can't be the Big 12 Conference's first leading rusher. But he doesn't stop at running. He's a pass rusher, too, and Lethridge likes throwing to him.

Last year, Tech won with a walk-on and a true freshman at receiver. The 1994 corps was injury-ridden heading into 1995 and had to sit out. Guess what? They're baaaaack. It could turn nasty for K-State's secondary, a squad missing preseason all-Big 12 cornerback Joe Gordon.

K-State's defensive line could be the team's biggest question mark because three starters from last year's No. 1 defense are gone. Defensive end Nyle Wiren leads the defensive line, and watch out for tackles Andrew Timmons and Jerome Evans. Snyder keeps hinting at press conferences that Evans could be something special. Texas Tech is his chance to prove it. Linebackers Travis Ochs, DeShawn Fogle and Mark Simoneau could be the remedy for an inexperienced defensive front.

Final score: K-State 34, Texas Tech 17.

Student turnout high for 1st crew meeting

■ In its inaugural year, K-State's women's crew shows potential to be a popular sport for students.

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Women's crew, K-State's newest varsity sport, took its first step into the water Tuesday as nearly 80 students gathered in the Little Theatre of the K-State Student Union to learn about rowing.

"What we're doing here tonight is starting a tradition," Jennifer Hale, Wildcat women's crew coach, said. "You have the opportunity to begin something here at this university and in this town that will last for years."

> "There's going to be a lot more discipline, a lot more work. But that's a good thing."
> • DIANE GORDON
> JUNIOR IN WILDLIFE BIOLOGY

Hale and men's crew club coach Al Koch began the session with general information for men and women interested in rowing.

"For the most part, people who row in the United States don't learn until they come to college. And many stay rowing well after college," Koch said.

"It's not a sport that's drawn the love of the campus or the town yet. We've never had a big following. But we may change that."

The women and men, many of whom were unfamiliar with rowing, stayed together to watch a video of the women's world championships.

"That was pretty impressive," Courtney Wilkens, sophomore in art, said. "It was such a beautiful thing — there's so much rhythm."

After that the groups split with the women discussing conditioning, training, practice times and NCAA academic regulations.

"Crew is different from any other sport in that you start with a sprint, the body of the race is a sprint, and you end with a sprint," Hale said. "Rowers are the best athletes in the world — they use their oxygen better than anyone else."

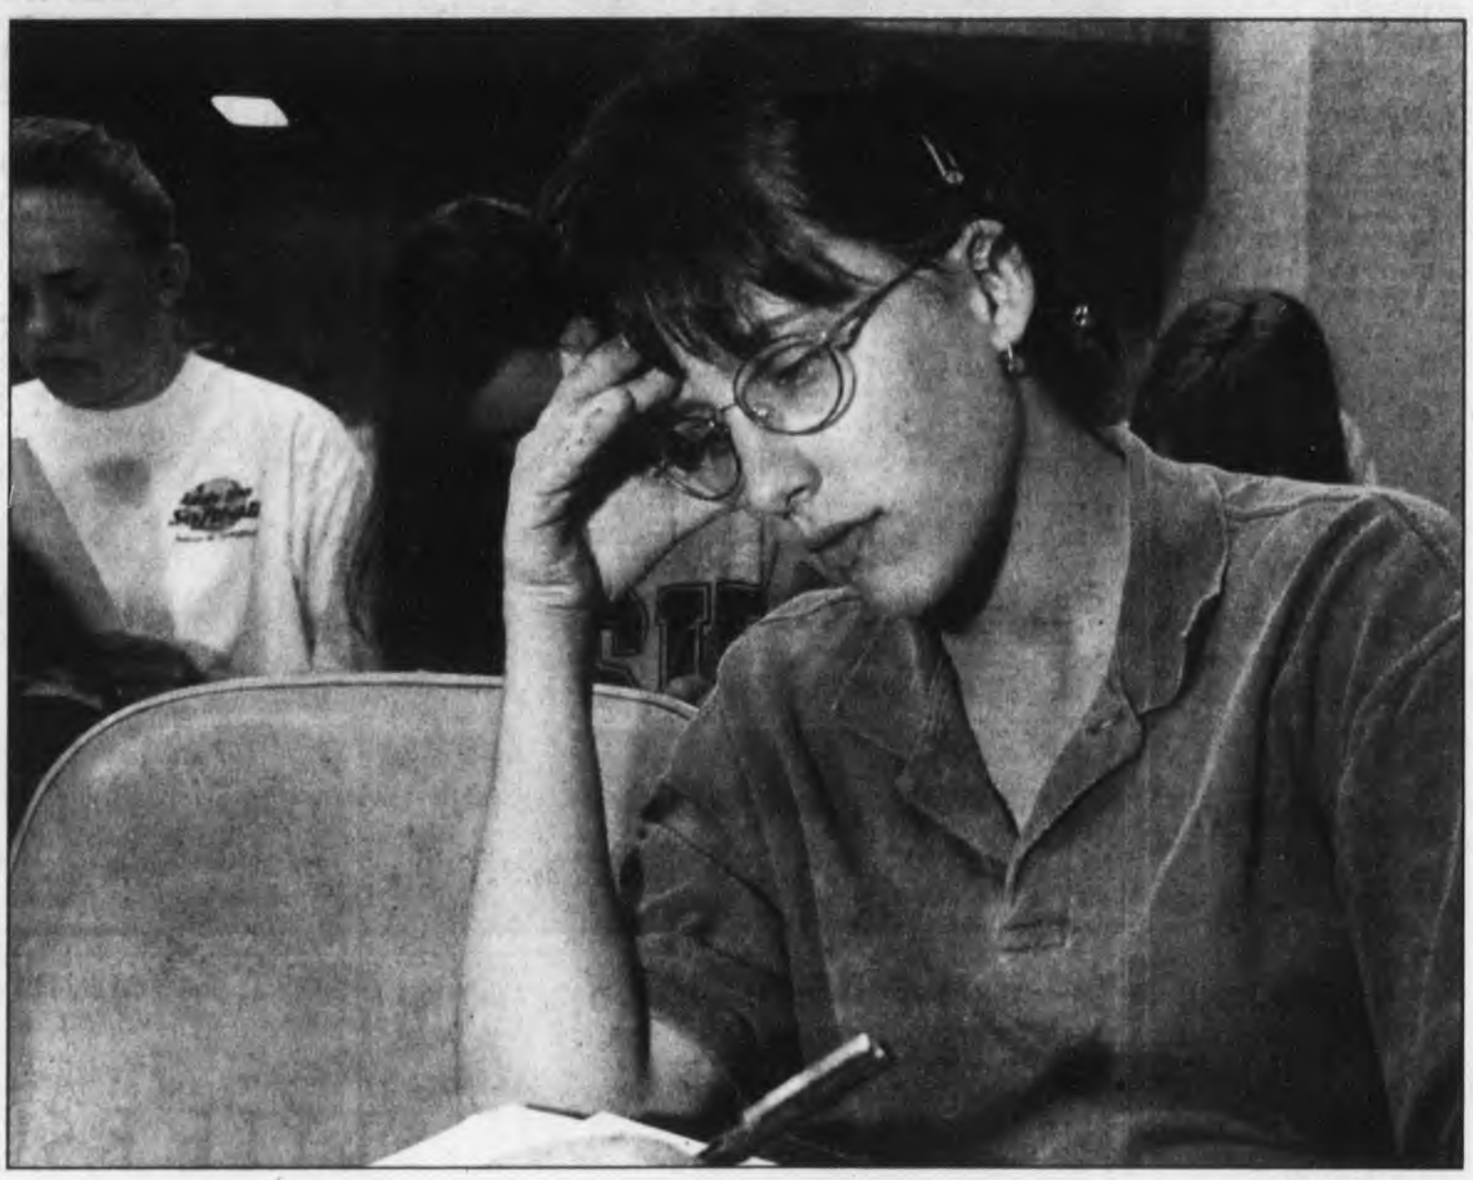
Hale said she had three main expectations of her athletes: to come to practice, to be on time and to give 100-percent effort.

"In my 15 years of coaching, I've only cut five girls and sent them home," she said. "That was when I was with the junior national team and we had to cut, or they'd have still come along with us."

Because K-State's program is in its inaugural year as a varsity sport, Hale said she did not know what meets the Cats would attend or who would go.

But Hale said returners from last year's club team might attend three of four meets this fall, and new members might earn the opportunity to travel.

Students who stay with the program will get the chance to race, she said.



"There's going to be a lot more discipline, a lot more work," said Diane Gordon, junior in wildlife biology and returning club member. "But that's a good thing. It will make us more competitive."

Although crew is a varsity sport, Hale said scholarships would not be available until next season. Most college squads have a novice program for first-year rowers, with scholarships being awarded to the more experienced rowers.

Most of the students in attendance had no prior experience with rowing. And while the expectations sounded intimidating to some, most were excited about the new opportunity.

"It think it will be very exciting and sounds challenging," Heather Brunk, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said. "But it also sounds like it's going to be fun."

"And it sounds harder than hell," said Jean Ann Carey, freshman in marketing.

Injury bug strikes team in preseason

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

The K-State volleyball team caught its first bad break of the season before it really even began.

Coach Jim Moore announced Tuesday that senior swing hitter Kelli Luther will sit out the rest of the season due to an injury.

Luther tore the anterior cruciate ligament in her left knee during a practice session earlier this month. Surgery is expected to be needed to repair the injury, causing her to miss the entire season.

Moore said the the loss of Luther was really going to hurt his team.

"It really hurts us from a leadership standpoint," Moore said. "She's a great leader.

"In the spring she did a great job of bringing us together as a team. It really hurts to have somebody that is that good of a person on your team go down."

No decision has been made as to whether Luther will seek an additional year of eligibility for the 1997 season.

Luther appeared in 40 games last year for the Cats after transferring from Wisconsin. She finished the season hitting .069 with 38 kills.

▶ NCAA ATHLETICS

K-State receives certification

COLLEGIAN STAFF

K-State's athletic programs have been certified by the NCAA Committee on Athletics Certification.

A designation of certified means that K-State has shown it operates its athletic programs in substantial conformity with operating principles adopted by Division I members of the NCAA. The certification process examined the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' academic and fiscal integrity, governance and commitment to rules compliance, and commitment to equity.

"We are extremely proud to be among those NCAA Division I athletic programs who have earned this accreditation," Jon Wefald, K-State president, said.

Departments can be recognized as certified, certified with conditions or not certified.

TELENET beams classes to hometowns across state

Chris Dean
staff reporter

People in 28 Kansas cities can now take K-State classes from their hometowns.

K-State, Emporia State University and Fort Hays State University are offering courses over TELENET 2, a desktop video-conferencing system, to various cities across the state. The systems have been set up in nearby colleges and, in some cases, local school districts to allow more Kansans to continue their education in their hometown.

TELENET 2, which replaced the original, audio-only TELENET system in February, allows students to watch as well as listen to the courses offered.

Each site is linked together with Integrated Services Digital Network circuits. These circuits allow the system to run video as well as audio at a cheaper cost to the user than just using audio alone on the old system. Each classroom is also equipped with a personal computer and a 17-inch monitor, video camera and speaker phone.

"We have already done evaluations from last spring," Sue White, coordinator for the Kansas Regents Network, said. "A vast majority, 90 percent or so, said they want to take more TELENET 2 classes."

Classes range in size from 15 to 70 students. The original TELENET allowed over 47,500 people to earn University credit, and even more are expected to benefit from TELENET 2.

"Over the summer about 375 people used the system, and it was more than that in the spring," White said. "We haven't turned away anyone yet."

Classes are offered in the late afternoon and on Saturdays, making them a convenient choice for students.

"Classes are from 4 to 10 p.m. and on Saturday mornings," White said. "If a class is closed, students can come here. It is also good for people who work in the community."

The opportunities TELENET presents are not limited to classes, however.

"We just had a student do a job interview with people over in Norway because it was too expensive to fly over there and then back, and he got the job," White said.

TELENET 2 also allows for help in instruction that before was not possible. Guest speakers can speak to a class without having to take as much time out of their schedule. Some classes have already used speakers from Colorado and the Washington, D.C., area.

"This music is happy music. I get happy when I play it, and I see the crowd getting happy when they listen and dance."

• Jason Teubner, trumpet for O'Phil! •

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

A CROWD gathers in the free-speech zone outside the K-State Student Union to hear Winfield band O'Phil! perform during the Wildcat Welcome concert Tuesday night. About 150 people attended the ska concert.

Students return with ska-filled Wildcat Welcome

Familiar musical styles are easily picked up when a new band starts out on the local level. O'Phil! had the challenge of presenting a relatively unknown style, ska, to its hometown of Winfield in 1994.

In the years since ska hit the surrounding area, though, the band has succeeded in making its music familiar, recorded an album and become a regular on the Wichita bar scene.

Now, O'Phil! has set its sights on bigger and better things — K-State.

O'Phil!'s performance last night as part of the Wildcat Welcome sponsored by the Union Program Council Special Events Committee, was patronized by about 150 people in the Union free-speech zone.

The band's set included several songs from its first and only album, "Activator," and some new tunes it is trying to piece together for a live collection album this winter.

> "I can define ska as 4,000-mile-per-hour reggae with an attitude."
> • ALEX THOMAS
> LEAD SINGER FOR O'PHIL!

One of the older pieces in the two-hour set was "On My Toes." Lead singer Alex Thomas gave credit to guitarist and vocalist Shane Marler for the song.

"The song 'On My Toes' was all Shane. He wanted the band to have that dance feel to it, and this is one of our songs that is about dancing. It gets people dancing. It fires us up to see people dancing, and the music reflects that dancing groove," lead singer Alex Thomas said.

A song O'Phil! is still working on is "Rolling Rock." Yes, the beer.

"Shane was sitting around trying to get a new song and he saw the bottle of Rolling Rock in front of him. It's his favorite beer," Thomas said.

"Two of the bars in Wichita that we play at started running specials on Rolling Rock when we play it, and it has become a big moneymaker for those bars," Thomas said.

For those who are unaware of the movement, Thomas explained ska music.

"It's sweet and simple for us. Ska came before reggae, but because reggae is more well-known, I can define ska as 4,000-mile-per-hour reggae with an attitude," Thomas said.

Drummer and vocalist Chris Burley was more philosophical.

"Our music ends up being a biography of our lives and experiences," Burley said.

"But our lives are not very complicated or complex, so our music is just party tunes. It's all about having a good time," Thomas said.

Thomas's good-time theory works for Jason Teubner, trumpet.

"This music is happy music. I get happy when I play it, and I see the crowd getting happy when they listen and dance," Teubner said.

The band has several dates coming up in the Wichita area and in its hometown of Winfield, where most of the members of the band are attending Southwestern College. O'Phil!'s current project should be out this winter.

Registration goes online

CHRIS DEAN
staff reporter

From now on, the only waiting in line for continuing education students will be in traffic jams on the information highway.

Beginning this fall, any student wishing to enroll in intersession, TELENET or Fort Riley courses can do so with online registration via the World Wide Web. Continuing education is the only department that offers this service, which adds a fourth option for students who could already enroll in classes by phone, fax or in person.

"It's so convenient. A student in Liberal can register 24 hours a day without having to wait for someone to answer the phone," said Melinda Sinn, public information coordinator for continuing education.

Despite this convenience, the system has yet to catch on with students.

"It hasn't been on long, so only a handful of students have utilized the service," Sinn said. "The World Wide Web is still new, and so it is still growing. This is something that will catch on as more people begin to use it."

Rob Caffey, programmer for the Division of Continuing Education and senior in information science, said the newness of the system is one reason why many students have not used the online registration.

"We just implemented it over the summer. We hope it will be used more

The Union Art Gallery takes on a new meaning this week as an exhibition, perhaps the first, of work by a married couple opened on Monday.

Renata and Rex Replogle are exhibiting works created during their one-year sabbatical from teaching in K-State's Department of Art last year, in the Union Art Gallery.

The two artists, who may be the only married couple to exhibit together in the K-State Student Union, could not differ more in choice of mediums or expressions.

Rex Replogle, associate professor of art and head of the sculpture program, works in sculpture, both wood and metal. However, he chose to concentrate his sabbatical work on developing works in wood.

His pieces are fluid and somewhat aerodynamic, particularly the novel little piece "Desert Scooter." Recalling the wind-sculpted topography of the American Southwest, which is where Rex Replogle has spent a majority of his sabbatical time, it's hard to imagine the piece composed of anything but wood.

> "Not everyone has the art background to see non-objective art and identify with it."
> • RENATA REPLOGLE
> ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF ART

Wood carries with it a certain warmth and suggestion of life that seems lost on metal — perhaps because we are surrounded by metallic factory productions which seem too distanced from nature.

However, the ode to the Southwest comes purposely. Rex Replogle said he spent time outdoors, mainly kayaking through canyons in Western Colorado and Utah, and then brought those images back into the studio with him and into his work.

Conversely, Renata Replogle's work is contained in only two dimensions and conceived not completely from natural occurrences. Her extensively wrought pencil drawings are puzzles to decipher, each individual work brimming with symbolic references and fantastic imagery. Viewing the drawings, one cannot but begin to question why they are what they are. In this, she has created a dialogue of sorts between artist and viewer that forms the basis for a shared experience.

"I really find that art has to be personal, but not to the point where I want to impose upon the viewer," said Renata Replogle, assistant professor of art and head of the pre-art therapy program. "I don't want to tell anyone what the drawings or symbols are."

"It is, in a sense, my world."

It is only logical that Renata Replogle's works instigate a soul-searching reaction due to her involvement with the pre-art therapy program.

She said her professional background is mainly with children — most obvious in her liberal allusions to children's fairy tales — but during the course of her sabbatical she worked to develop new artistic ideas of expression with elderly people and at professional conferences.

"Not everyone has the art background to see non-objective art and identify with it," she said.

Renata Replogle said she feels lucky the University allowed both her and her husband to take sabbatical the same year.

"It gives us time to think about where we are, where we've been and where we're going professionally and personally," she said. "We artists get into a mode of a certain kind of style and direction, and it becomes habitual.

"It gave me an opportunity to distance myself from my professional involvement with the students and the University in order to objectively re-evaluate and rethink what I'm doing," she said.

Renata Replogle said the sabbatical gave her time to reflect on her past work while exploring her current work in more depth.

Rex Replogle said the sabbatical gave him time to see what other artists working in wood sculpture were doing.

At K-State, a faculty member can take a sabbatical every seven years to develop professionally and personally. The University pays half of the regular yearly salary, which makes it an expensive attraction.

Although he has been at K-State for 30 years, this is only the second sabbatical Rex Replogle has taken.

"It's hard to find time to settle and focus on what you want to do, he said.

"My other sabbatical also focused on wood, but I hoped to get back into it."

KSU playwright hits Broadway

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
staff reporter

Taking Manhattan, Kan., is one thing.

Taking Manhattan, N.Y., is quite another.

But that is what moonlighting playwright and day-jobbing associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences Judith Zivanovic is doing.

Her one-act play, "She," is her fourth one-act produced by Love Creek Productions of New York. The play was produced as part of the company's Summer One-Act Festival in July in two theaters in the heart of New York City's theater district.

Zivanovic said it had only been a month after she sent the play to Love Creek before they responded positively to producing it for their festival.

"It can be years before you hear back," she said, "but Love Creek is an interesting company.

"It was started by students from the Midwest and has ties to the Midwest schools, particularly Missouri's schools, so the majority of the plays are by Midwest playwrights."

Zivanovic's "She" is about a beautiful woman of 29, Beatrice Wolfe, who carefully plays down her own intelligence and wit to improve her successes in flirting with other men and her own husband.

"The impetus is a young woman I knew many years ago who was pretty and intelligent, but she acted quite silly to attract the attention of men," Zivanovic said. "I thought of her as an existential thing — she was making herself an object — so that's why she talks about herself in the third person."

The treatment of women as objects is not really a new idea, but Zivanovic said she thinks it is still timely.

"We have today people in New York City trying to create a school for girls," she said. "It's ironic that they are still having this controversy as to whether young women learn better by themselves."

The play is set in a plush hotel room, which is basically divided into three sections: the conversation between Bea and an admiring man from an opposite balcony, between Bea and her husband, and within Bea's mind.

Needless to say, the two men in Bea's life leave much to be desired. Zivanovic has figured the admirer as some sort of a Peter Pan character who, although he is older, refuses to grow up — a man who is simply out looking for some fun.

Bea's husband isn't much better. He practically refuses to let her get a word in edgewise — not that it matters, because Bea rarely speaks her mind and only then by accident.

The original concept for the play required Bea to interact with her husband and the man she flirts with onstage, but per Love Creek's request, Zivanovic rewrote the play to make the two men voiceovers. So, in actuality, the play works virtually in Bea's mind.

"A lot of it (the play) is in her mind," she said. "It makes it a lot more demanding on the actress to interact with people who are voiceovers in her head."

This internal dialogue is where Bea does most of her work. Her spoken comments to her husband don't offer a glimpse of what she is thinking when she faces her life's worth in this excerpt:

"'Will the real Beatrice Wolfe please step? — ' If she could make it through the layers and layers of curtains, what would step forward? A string of paper dolls, alike but separate. If she detached one, colored it and said the magic words, would it become what she wanted it to be? What was that? Damned if she knew."

Zivanovic's past work has mainly dealt with women's issues but isn't necessarily concerned with any sort of feminist movement.

"I'm interested in various aspects of life that involve women and to give good roles to women," she said. "This is an interest I've had for a long time."

"I'm not interested in that kind of politically charged thinking that makes you extreme," she said.

as the year goes on," he said. "It has been used, just not very much.

"The problem is it is not as easy to use as we hope it will be someday. It's convenient, but you have to know the ID number, course number, course name, amount of fees and teacher. We hope that one day we will have a line schedule online, so you can just select your course."

Students wishing to use the online registration can pay for the classes using Mastercard or Visa. Although people have been hesitant about sending credit-card numbers out on the Internet before, Caffey said that will not be a problem.

"This is a very safe way," he said. "All information is encrypted, and basically it's a very safe way to transfer the information, probably safer than reading your number out loud over the phone where anyone could be listening."

Although the Department of Continuing Education cannot make predictions for the University as a whole, Caffey said once the system becomes easier to use, the system could potentially be used by more departments.

Anyone interested in information on registering for continuing education class via the Web can access it at (http://www.dce.ksu.edu/dce/) or call 532-5566.

Students do not have to wait until Saturday's football game to show their Wildcat spirit. Tonight, Purple Power Play on Poyntz kicks off K-State's first Big 12 season.

Starting at 6 p.m. games, contests, bands and speakers will entertain fans for the next two nights.

Students looking for their 15 minutes of fame should consider entering the Awesome Banner Contest (ABC).

"We figure everyone is going to make banners for the game on Saturday anyway," Scott Morrill, Manhattan Main Street project manager, said. "This way they'll have twice the chance to be on television because Channel 49 is using footage from the contest for its video package at Saturday's game."

The ABC winner will receive a VIP package for the Oklahoma game including two tickets, a parking pass, game programs, a pregame press box tour and an autographed football.

Dave Colburn, event coordinator, said a large student crowd is expected to attend today's pep rally at 8 p.m. featuring K-State football coach Bill Snyder and the team captains.

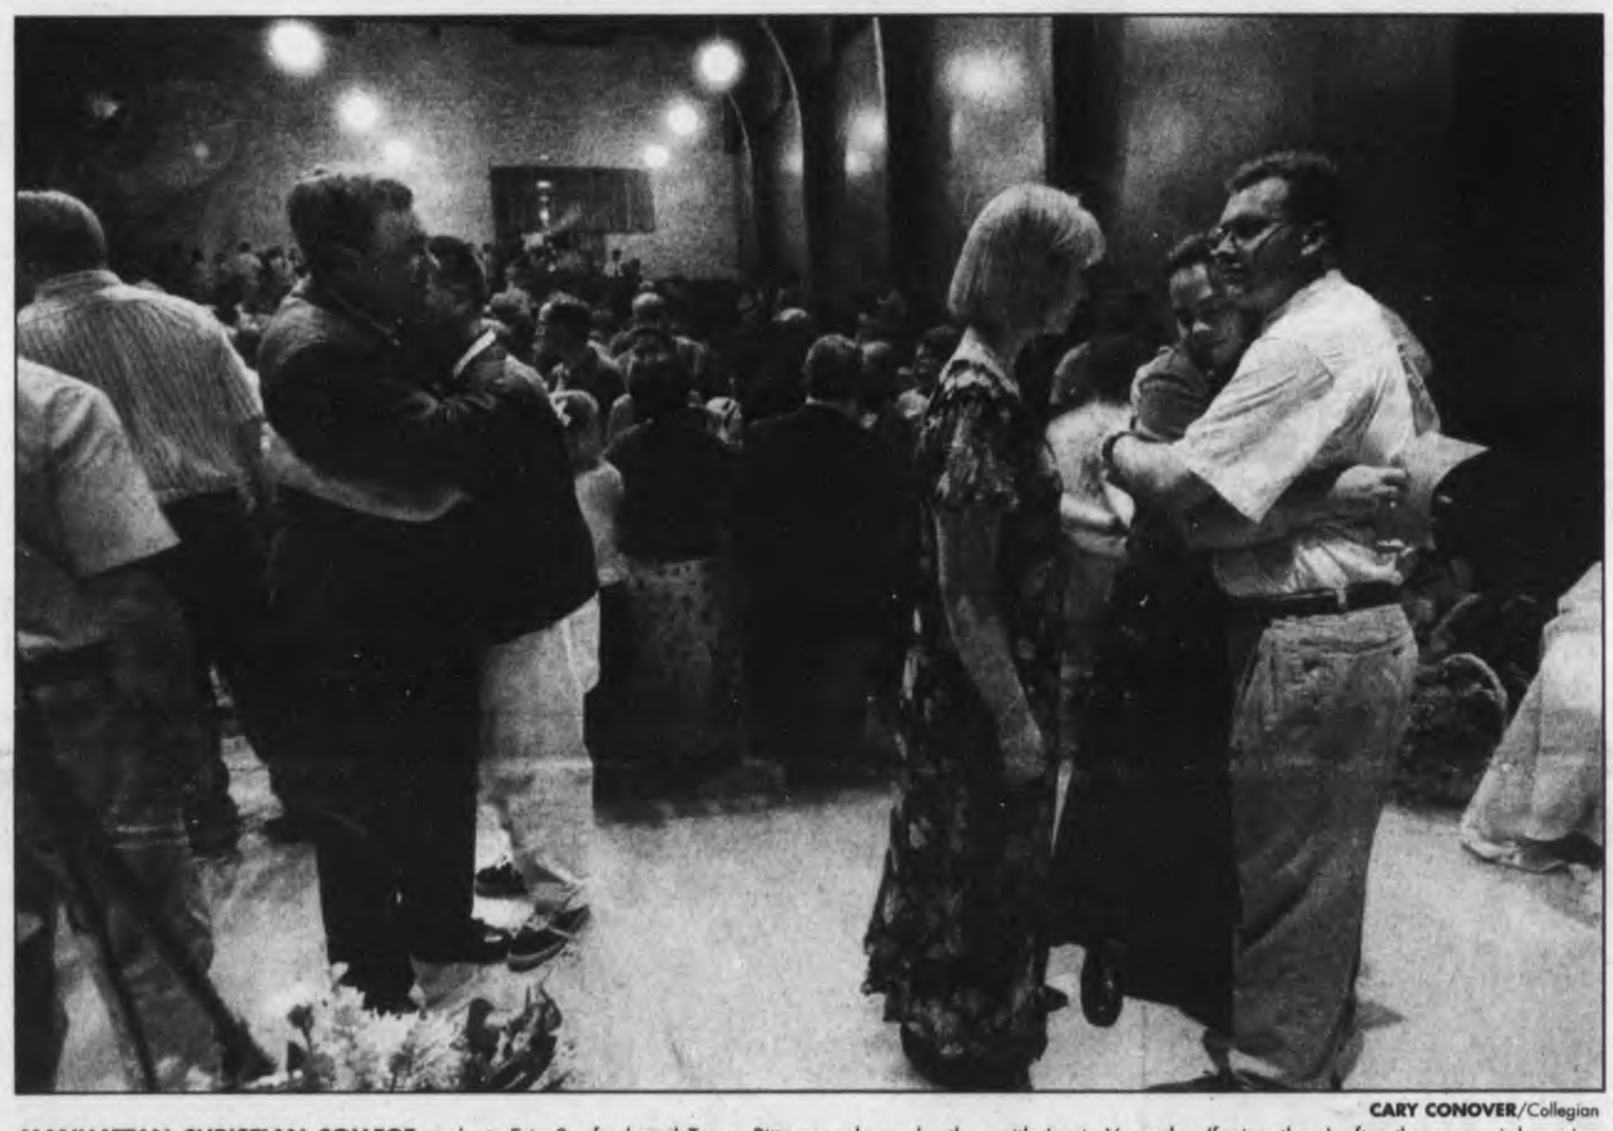
"This event is such a great opportunity for our players to see what tremendous support they have from the University and the community," Snyder said.

"Our players have always been appreciative of the enthusiasm shown for the team," he said.

Colburn said the free Turquoise Sol concert is also expected to draw a large number of students.

"Turquoise Sol is a band for the 20-something age group with a kind of calypso, Caribbean sound," Colburn said.

Activities are not just for college students, but fans of all ages. Games for children and free photos with Willie the Wildcat will be offered.



A non-perishable food donation for the Flint Hills Breadbasket is requested for photos with Willie the Wildcat.

"There will be events even for those who don't like football," Colburn said. "But if they do like football, I definitely don't think they'll be disappointed."

Students remember classmates' lives

JILL STORY
contributing writer

All Faiths Chapel was filled to capacity last night as students, faculty, alumni and friends gathered to remember and celebrate the lives of three Manhattan Christian College students who died this summer.

Yvonne Kafka of Goodland; Scott Thomson of Vista, Calif.; and Matthew Glenn of Norton died from injuries sustained in a one-vehicle accident that occurred July 27 near Albuquerque, N.M.

The three were members of a camp team that had spent the summer traveling to Christian conferences and camps in the Midwest, ministering to hundreds of youth. A fourth team member, Maya Needham of Garden City, survived the accident and was able to attend the memorial service.

"Because we are such a small school, when you lose three students it affects everybody. And because we have a common bond in Christ, it affects us even more deeply, and that is what we saw tonight," said John Poulson, vice president of admissions.

The service included a praise-and-worship time and a slide show with pictures of the team members involved in school activities. Soccer-team members wore their jerseys on behalf of their teammates who died.

"It's our way to remember Scott. He played with us for two seasons. We have good memories," Heath Hostetler, MCC senior, said.

There was also an open-mike time when those present shared stories about how Thomson, Kafka and Glenn had affected their lives. The time included everything from humorous stories to quiet remembrances and affirmations of the impact the team had on those they had worked with.

Andy Schroeder, of the Christ in Youth conference the team had attended the week before the accident, said the Oklahoma conference depended heavily on camp teams like the one from MCC.

"This team did an excellent job. We saw hundreds of young people's lives changed through the ministry of Scott, Yvonne, Matt and Maya," Schroeder said.

President of MCC Ken Cable said the school has received an outpouring of support and love from other colleges, churches and people across the nation.

"I am not aware of any single event in the history of this school that has captured the attention and the hearts of so many people as this one has," Cable said.

"I think this service really gave us all a chance for closure. Many of us couldn't make it to any of the funerals," said Scott Wagner, who drove in from Cherokee, Iowa, to attend.

Loren Deckard, associate professor of pastoral ministry at MCC, spoke for a few minutes on what grieving was and encouraged those who attended the service to work through their pain at their own pace.

"Cry out your grief and your complaint. Let your heart hurt. It isn't unfaithfulness to do so. Engage God in the conversation of your grief, and then listen and let his Spirit heal your sorrow," Deckard said.

The college has started a memorial scholarship fund in the names of Thomson, Kafka and Glenn. Contributions can be sent to the school in any or all of their names.

"We honor the lives of Yvonne, Matt and Scott, and we together join our hearts in memorial to them," Deckard said.

"They could not have left more of a legacy of faith had they lived to be 80."

▶ K-STATE EMPLOYMENT

New director still sought, interim named

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

The move to Edwards Hall isn't the only change Parking Services has made this year. There has also been a change in supervision within the department.

Peggy Winkler was appointed acting director of Parking Services July 1. Before the appointment, she was accounting specialist. She has worked for Parking Services since September 1991.

As acting director, Winkler coordinates the development and administration of policies and supervises operation of Parking Services and employees.

"I am available for people with questions and complaints about Parking Services," Winkler said.

She also continues to carry out her duties as accounting specialist.

John Lambert, director of public safety, said he chose Winkler because of her experience and familiarity with everything involved in the position.

Winkler's position is temporary, however, and a new director should be found by February or March, Lambert said.

The director spot was left vacant when Dwain Archer became the director of fire-safety inspections.

Vehicle plant plans K-State partnership

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANHATTAN — A plant that manufactures "clean-air" vehicles that use alternative fuel plans to start a partnership with K-State.

Troy Design and Manufacturing, a Redford, Mich.,-based company, planned a ribbon-cutting Thursday at the new facility in this northeast Kansas town. The plant started production in May, and officials said it will employ about 100 people by the end of the year.

TDM president William Roberts was scheduled to announce a program to work with K-State, giving the school 50,000 square feet designed to link the automotive industry and education technology.

The plant produces Ford Contours that will run on both gasoline and compressed natural gas. It also has plans for electric vehicle development.

Campus lighting project sheds light, eliminating shadows of safety doubt

More lights on campus provide more safety to the student body. Should the lighting project include city streets in residential areas? Find out what the Collegian editorial board wants.

Projects to improve campus lighting will be under way in September, with the University looking for an increase in safety in many heavy-traffic areas.

Costing an estimated $80,000, the projects are being funded by the City/University Tax Fund, with University maintenance shops installing the lights on campus.

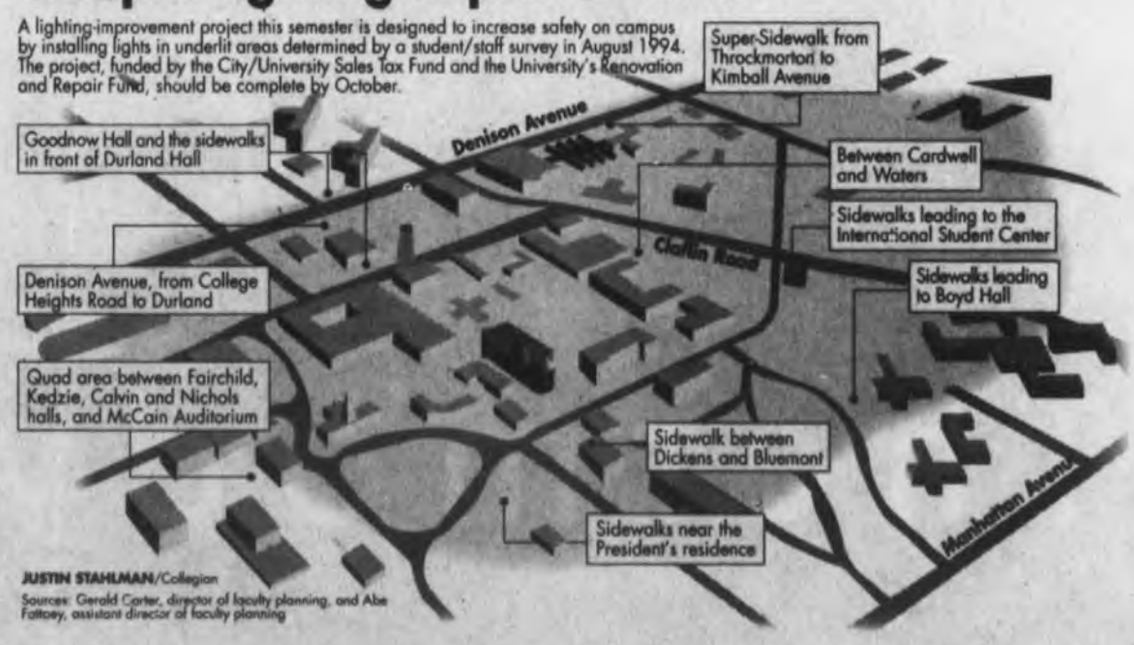
The fund was created after the city annexed the University. The city allotted half of the money with the University matching the sum, Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said.

Gerald Carter, director of facility planning, said the lights would improve the darker areas in more well-traveled routes and make campus safer.

"Any time you install a few more lights and upgrade others, the well-traveled routes are improved," Carter said. "It makes faculty and students feel safer."

Aaron Otto, student body vice president, said the new lighting should change the campus' attitude by making areas brighter.

"We needed to do a lot of catching up," Otto said.



He said with the growth of the campus over the last two decades, it was time for the University to upgrade the safety measures on campus.

Ronnie Grice, K-State Police director, said while universities have designated areas that are darker, lighting key areas always improves safety.

"But you have to have a safety-conscious mind, too," Grice said.

Campus lighting improvements

A lighting-improvement project this semester is designed to increase safety on campus by installing lights in underlit areas determined by a student/staff survey in August 1994. The project, funded by the City/University Sales Tax Fund and the University's Renovation and Repair Fund, should be complete by October.

24 HOURS IN REVIEW

NATION WORLD

• CHEMICAL WEAPONS. The Pentagon acknowledged on Wednesday that it knew as far back as November 1991 that chemical weapons had been stored at an Iraqi ammunition depot that U.S. troops had demolished just months earlier.

• MIDDLE EAST PEACE. Yasser Arafat accused Israel on Wednesday of declaring war on Palestinians by expanding West Bank settlements, and the Palestinian legislative council called for an end to contacts with the Jewish state.

• GUATEMALAN PEACE TALKS. Government and rebel representatives resumed talks Tuesday on the future of the country's military, buoyed by recent progress in ending Guatemala's three-decade civil war. Both sides have stuck to an informal March cease-fire and are to sign a final truce in October in Oslo, Norway. The final accord is expected later this year and will lay out plans for demobilization of the 1,000-2,000 guerrillas still hiding in the Guatemalan countryside.

CITY STATE

• REPUBLICAN RIVER. Nebraska negotiators trying to find a settlement in the controversy over Republican River water flows into Kansas fear Nebraska could lose some of its irrigation wells unless action is taken soon.

• ABORTION-CLINIC ATTACKS. An Oregon woman who is serving a 10-year sentence for shooting a Kansas abortion doctor must serve 20 additional years for arson and acid attacks at abortion clinics in Oregon, California and Nevada, a federal appeals court has ruled. Rachelle "Shelley" Shannon of Grants Pass, Ore., pleaded guilty in June 1995 to the attacks on eight clinics in 1992 but appealed the additional sentence. In August 1993, she shot Dr. George Tiller outside his clinic in Wichita. Tiller was wounded in both arms but returned to work the next day. Shannon was convicted of attempted murder.

SPORTS

• NBA SUES AOL. The NBA is suing America Online and Stats Inc. for using game scores and data without permission, an NBA lawyer said Wednesday. The NBA wants to block AOL from using real-time information on its games. This suit is almost identical to one against Motorola that the NBA won last month. In that ruling, a federal judge said Motorola could not put out NBA scores on a pager because the NBA owned the scores.

• MISSOURI PLAYERS ARRESTED. Two Missouri players have been suspended for Saturday's season-opener at Texas after their arrests on theft charges, Coach Larry Smith said. Sophomore defensive back Randy Potter and junior nose tackle Donnell Jones were arrested Monday night for allegedly shoplifting clothing worth $191 from the JCPenney store at the Columbia Mall, police Capt. Randy Boehm said. Jones also was found to have an outstanding warrant issued in March for bad checks.

• TUCKER OUT FOR THREE WEEKS. Kansas City outfielder Michael Tucker will miss at least three weeks, a Royals spokesman said. Tucker dislocated a finger in Tuesday night's game with the Texas Rangers. He was injured while making a head-first slide for an infield hit that drove in the winning run in the 10th inning of a 4-3 victory. Tucker's finger will be in a splint for three weeks, and doctors then will decide whether he can return this season, Fink said.

Residence halls get plugged in

KENNY WENTWORTH
staff writer

Starting this semester, the information superhighway will be easier to access in the comfort of a residence hall.

All residence-hall rooms are now wired for Ethernet, the connection that links students to the Internet through their computer.

Residents have had the chance to have Internet access for the last two years, but with the link built into the rooms, the process becomes simpler for students, said Aaron French, sophomore in computer and electrical engineering.

"Last year it took a long time for the people to come into my room and set everything up. Now it is so nice just to hook up my computer and have the Internet at my fingertips," French said.

As the world constantly becomes more Internet-dependent, Housing and Dining Services wanted residents to take full advantage of the information superhighway.

"This is the type of service we believe in offering our students," Danya Hatley, microcomputer specialist for Housing and Dining Services, said.

The project has been in the making for more than six years, but this summer, Housing and Dining Services was able to go into the residence halls and finalize the project. To receive Internet access, the student must purchase a cable cord and an Ethernet card, and pay a one-time fee of $150. That fee has increased from last year for Housing and Dining Services to remain within the budget.

The total project has added up to be an estimated price of $150,000.

Merchants cracking down on sales to minors

KELLY FURNAS
staff reporter

Tobacco retailers in Manhattan have had a pretty effective wake-up call, said Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy.

This wake-up call was dialed by Attorney General Carla Stovall in her 1996 action to have minors attempt to buy tobacco products from stores. Kennedy said retailers who are caught lose their licenses.

"According to what I saw, we have caught eight to 10 tobacco sales to minors in Manhattan," Kennedy said.

In addition to the crackdown on tobacco sales, Kennedy said he has seen progress related to the sale of alcohol to minors.

"There have been large fines against various Manhattan (alcohol) resellers," he said. "I feel these fines have had a positive effect on the community."

Kennedy said the threat of being fined has caused bar owners to take stronger measures to prevent alcohol sales to minors.

"We have seen bar owners give rewards to door people who catch fake IDs," he said. "It's really a positive correlation between law enforcement and the bars."

Greg Finn, owner of the Gin Mill Lounge, said the first thing he tells employees when hiring them is not to sell to minors and to check IDs.

"The most basic thing we do to prevent the sale of alcohol to minors is check IDs of people we don't know," he said. "If it looks like a valid license, there's nothing we can do but sell them alcohol."

If an employee does run into a fake ID, Finn said the action taken depends on the situation.

"I'm 6 foot tall, 190 pounds. If someone hands me a fake ID, I'll probably turn it in," he said. "But if one of our female waitresses receives one and the guy wants it back, I don't want her getting hurt."

But even though Finn's bar checks IDs, he says that doesn't guarantee anything.

"I promise you there isn't a bar in the world that hasn't sold alcohol to a minor," he said. "College kids are going to find a way."

Despite that, Finn said that since he bought the Gin Mill Lounge in March 1995, police have not caught a minor in possession of alcohol in the bar.

"We have been very lucky," he said. "We don't need that down here."

Despite the efforts of bar owners, Kennedy said the problem with underage drinking is not only with the seller.

"The fact of the matter is that younger people will go through a great length to drink," he said.

One such method, Kennedy said, is through greek and private parties.

"Certainly private parties are a serious problem," he said. "If they are not careful, those organizations are going to find themselves raided. It's going to happen."

Canyon tours show off geology after flooding

Contact the Corps of Engineers office at 5020 Tuttle Creek Blvd. or 539-8511.

Free tours of Tuttle Creek State Park's Grand Canyon will be given at 7 p.m. Saturday. The tour is sponsored by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, and anyone can attend.

Many new aspects of geological history were unearthed by the flood of 1993.

During a 21-day period in 1993, the 18 spillway gates were opened to release 27 million gallons of water per minute.

The enormous water flow removed 380,000 cubic yards of sediment. The limestone and shales uncovered in the spillway area date back to the Permian Age, about 25 million years ago, when fish, reptiles and amphibians evolved. The newly uncovered layers are rich in fossilized remains. The jaw section of a shark is being studied at K-State.

The tour will be conducted by Corps of Engineers ranger Todd Garrett and will last about an hour. It will begin in the north parking lot of the spillway cycle area, which is south of the spillway on the first road east of the spillway.

IN OUR OPINION

Lighting should be priority both on and off campus

You might have noticed the campus is a little brighter this year.

New lighting has been installed in several key campus areas thanks to an effort on the part of concerned administrators, students and city officials.

The lights were made possible by money generated by the City/University Tax Fund, the money made available through the annexation of K-State by the City of Manhattan.

WHY WE CARE

The new lights on campus are a positive first step, but don't stop there. Attention should also be given to the off-campus lighting situation.

The money is earmarked for projects that are beneficial for both the city and the University.

However, the city's involvement in safety shouldn't stop here. Lighting Manhattan is an ongoing project with many more possibilities.

Attention must be paid to the off-campus lighting situation.

The streets surrounding campus are dark and foreboding. Kansas Power and Light is the company responsible for installing street lights. However, only the city commission can mandate more lights per block.

A hit-and-run death at 12th and Thurston streets occurred over the summer, partly due to poor street lighting.

It's obvious, for most students and faculty who walk home at night, this is an issue that needs to be addressed more urgently by city officials.

The on-campus lighting situation has room for improvement as well.

More common than ever are light poles that rise to darkness because their bulbs are either broken or completely nonexistent.

Students should not hesitate to call the K-State Police to report lights that are out. Just look at the base or the pole for an identification number.

Lighting is a great project for Student Governing Association to pursue. Student Senate's Parking and Campus Safety Committee should make campus lighting a priority by either conducting campus surveys of lights or identifying dark areas.

The campus lighting situation has come a long way in the past three years, but there is no reason to slow down the effort. When students, administrators and city officials work together, the future can look so bright.

When the sun goes down, the lights come on, and it needs to stay that way.

Columnist challenges readers to explore their belief system

MY

Erin
MANSUR-SMITH

"Collegian columnists apply journalistic standards of accuracy, balance, brevity, fairness and attribution to speak their consciences through the opinion page. Their primary goal should not be to provoke letters to the editor.

"Their responsibility is to inform, to challenge and to entertain readers with their insight." — Collegian newsstaff job descriptions, Student Publications Inc.

I have been working for the Collegian for four years, and it was only a few weeks ago, after taking a semester off from writing, that I actually sat down and read my job description all the way through.

Ah, I thought when I was done. That is what I am supposed to do. After I had stopped laughing hysterically, wiped my eyes and changed my shorts, I thought about my job as columnist and how different things have been since I started this job eons ago.

When I came to the Collegian, when God was an undergrad, we were still an award-winning paper, minus the nifty modern-day conveniences of new computers and a budget that was a shoestring, not dental floss.

It was back before Farrell Library was renovated, the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art was built and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex was still a gleam in President Jon Wefald's eye.

Most of the people I worked with have either died of old age or have become mad drunks, which is really not much different from their lives here.

My life, however, is different, and so is my job. As a columnist then, I was supposed to be fair and balanced and all that other good stuff. Most of the time, I (and my poor editors) settled for my column being written within 20 minutes of press time, with or without a valid point.

Back in my beginning years, I never considered myself a journalist. Fed on (and fed up with) images of the papparazzi and other sleazoid, sensationalist, blood-hacking crap about the latest presidential faux pas or celebrity hanged in effigy, I considered my work above that of mere journalism.

I can almost hear print and broadcast journalism majors across campus foaming at the mouth in righteous indignation over that remark.

I wanted to provoke. I wanted to challenge you. Not to get you to write letters to the editor telling me I was a crackpot or a Clinton-loving, Hillary-hooting, save the sea lions, liberal freak, but because I wanted you to do something about what you believed in.

> "Explore your own belief system. Think about how what I write makes you feel, and as long as it doesn't maim anyone or incite a riot, do something about it."

I wanted my columns to make you act. This job was about more than reporting the news. It was putting a face on it for you and making you see that, because of where you are physically and intellectually, you have an incredible amount of power at your disposal to learn, to think and to do.

I have learned that what I did before was one aspect of true journalism. Journalism is about truth, accuracy, brevity and balance. The Collegian is intended to inform. It is sometimes intended to entertain, and it may not appear to be, but it is a difficult thing to accomplish.

I will do the best I can to apply all the attributes outlined in my job description. I lost my conscience on a trip to New York years ago, but it has a toe tag with my name and address. I assume it will be returned eventually. When it is, I'll put it to work.

But I am not the only one with a job here. You have a responsibility, too. This is one column of one opinion. I will use facts and personal experiences to lend those opinions credence. I will attempt to be fair, but I tend to take a side in some issues. That side might not be the one you are on.

Explore your own belief system. Think about how what I write makes you feel, and as long as it doesn't maim anyone or incite a riot, do something about it.

If that exploration leads you to a letter to my editor, Fine. I will take into consideration anything you may want to write to me. This is your forum for free expression (edited for content and spelling errors, of course). Use it.

I am glad to be back. Being away has only made me appreciate all the things I was never aware I had before. It has also helped me identify the cause of all those mysterious rashes.

Harmonizing heart and mind

Planning is a key element in matters of love, education and everything in between

This is the fourth day of classes, and by now I'm sure you've learned a few new things about your college life.

Maybe, if you're a freshman, you've learned there is a lot you don't know. If you're a junior like I am, you've finally found a routine that works.

Thinking back to when I was a freshman, I can slightly remember the uncomfortable feeling in my mind of walking to the K-State Student Union. The trees seem so close to my heart these days.

As a freshman I was excited to be part of something as big as K-State. There were so many things to do and so many opportunities.

But the one constant dilemma through it all has been a single, universal problem I have yet to completely solve.

I doubt I will ever solve it. The problem reminds me of the mathematical graph of f(x)=1/x. I think of the solution as the asymptote, and, as time goes on, I get closer to the answer but never reach it.

The actual problem is simple. Have you ever had a great idea, but when you tried to put action behind your thoughts things went wrong?

Whether it is building a loft in your residence hall or striking up a conversation with someone you find interesting, turning an idea into reality is difficult.

Let us define some things here. What is an idea? An idea is everything from "I want to get a 4.0 this semester" to "I want to get to know that person over there."

So what is reality? Reality is when you get your grade card in December and it says 4.0 grade point average. Reality is when you become friends with that person over there.

The reality we live in is often different from the ideas that grow in our mind. But when you plan an idea, it can usually become reality.

If you are trying to get a 4.0 GPA, you should plan out how you are going to do this. Your plan could involve studying or reading or a combination of those two.

The problem with this method is planning is not always a good thing. Planning can sometimes be your enemy.

Even though you should plan how to get a 4.0 GPA, you should not plan how to get to know that person over there.

Plans are actions for ideas only when these ideas depend on outside resources. For example, building a loft is an idea that depends on materials, money, structure and time.

The problem is when trying to turn your idea of a loft into an actual loft, it's easy to overlook things like the compressive strength of a 2-by-4 piece of pine.

More simply put, if you don't plan some things out, you won't be able to trust your materials. They could fail you.

So planning gives you security. But if you planned out all your ideas, your planning could backfire.

Imagine you tried to plan out getting to know someone. That is, you controlled the relationship-building environment.

Maybe you planned on coincidentally appearing at this person's apartment, or you figured out part of that person's schedule so you could meet.

This would allow you to control your interactions with this person, but in exchange for this security, you would become disconnected with your original, natural feelings.

What I mean is when you initially have a feeling, such as wanting to get to know someone, the more you plan out this goal, the further you distance yourself from your initial feeling.

Overall, planning does not work when the idea depends on your own resources, such as humor, inspiration or knowledge.

This is because planning is an objective and mechanistic thing that, by its nature, tends to remove the natural, initial emotions.

MY

Rhett
HARTMAN

So planning out ideas from your heart (and depending on yourself) creates discord between your ideas and reality.

This kind of planning is basically your mind telling your heart, "I don't trust you, so I'm taking over."

When your ideas don't need money or other exterior things to work, nothing can fail you except yourself. This can be risky, though.

Therefore, if you try to plan an idea into reality, an idea that in itself doesn't need anything but you to work, then you are distrusting your ideas and your sense of self.

This weakens the link between your ideas and your reality, of which many things are a part.

But as I sit here and try to express my ideas to you, I could be failing, because I am still trying to understand my own ideas and how to make them reality. We all have doubts. Just remember we are young, and not only our lives but the whole semester are ahead of us. I hope we can meet in the end.

Language diversity

Editor,

I find that I rather quickly part paths with Neil Pundit on the matter of an official language for the United States ("Readers Write," Tuesday). Of the many factors involved, I'll just touch on four.

First, Pundit seems to want a great deal more governmental meddling and control than I would be able to stomach. People who think it would be nice to have only one language in the world need to read their Orwell. (Not that this will stop various politicians from trying to make hay out of our differences.)

Second, Pundit very seriously underestimates the value of diverse languages. It has been said many times that each language is a way of making sense of the world, of organizing experience. So, as someone once asked, "How do we know English is the right one?" Maybe we should be fostering languages and not trying to kill them (compare biological diversity).

Third, there are countless families in which parents, particularly recent immigrants but also Native Americans and others, withhold other languages from their children so they will learn only English. This is often done in an attempt to protect the children from prejudice, but there are other reasons, too. In any case, I personally have heard many of these children, now grown up, lamenting the practice. They desperately want to know those languages as a way of connecting to their past, of knowing who they are.

Finally, English already is the de facto language of the United States and second language of the world. All those politicians who were against the Equal Rights Amendment as an unnecessary duplication of the protection of the equal status of women should now presumably disfavor any legislation that proclaims English to be the official language. But I won't count on it.

Musicians gave their all

In response to an article that covered the benefit concert held outside the Strong Complex on Aug. 23, I would like to comment on the performance of the band Ruskabank.

As a big fan of the band, I found the article discredited its excellent performance. From my perspective, I saw seven dehydrated, sunburned, sweat-drenched, talented musicians playing their hearts out. These guys did not look bored to me. They looked hot.

The turn-out at the concert was low because it was not publicized off campus. If one of the band's members had not told me, I would not have known about it. Ruskabank had a lot of fans there to support it.

The members even managed to attract quite a few dancers from the hot and sweaty audience who skanked to the sounds of Manhattan's favorite ska band.

They're back again; Java reopens its doors

JEREMY KELLEY
staff reporter

Seattle latté, anyone?

If you know what that means, you've probably spent time at Java Espresso & Bakery, a little coffeehouse in Aggieville that was closed most of the summer.

Java reopened Aug. 15 with a new manager and owner.

"We made some cosmetic changes," Mark Skochdopole, manager and owner of Java, said. "We painted the walls and the trim and made it look a little nicer."

Skochdopole also compiled a new staff.

"There are a few people left from the other staff who are still employed here, but other than that, I have gotten all new staff bakers and coffee makers," Skochdopole said.

Skochdopole was in Chicago for the last five years, working at a restaurant-management company called Lettuce Entertain You. He heard of the outstanding clientele the coffeehouse had and wanted to expand it when he heard it had closed.

"They had the volume they needed," Skochdopole said. "They just needed something to boost them. I saw an opportunity, and I took it."

Skochdopole loves the location of the coffeehouse, because it is central to Manhattan.

"There is a definite need for a lunch spot and coffeehouse here in Manhattan and especially in Aggieville," Skochdopole said.

He said he feels the location is great despite its being in primarily bar-populated Aggieville.

"We get an awful lot of students in here, especially at night, who come in here to study, to talk or just to have some coffee," Skochdopole said.

The coffee shop has pretty much kept the same menu items as before, with a few minor additions.

Tri-Sigs build up from ground zero

DARCIE MCCONKEY

Recolonization is a word few people hear every day, but to one K-State sorority, it has become an essential element in building a new and stronger chapter.

Members of K-State's Delta Phi chapter were asked to become alumnae last spring when Sigma Sigma Sigma's national organization decided to reorganize the sorority through recolonization.

Tri Sigma sorority participated in August Rush and will have a second rush Sept. 10-14.

The national organization decided to close the previous establishment to build a stronger, healthier and more viable chapter with new members, said Becky Cazedessus, who is overseeing recolonization.

"We value K-State's campus and greek systems and want Tri Sigma to be a strong, vital house here. We believe the new members will create enthusiasm and encourage other women to join the organization," she said.

Although only 15 women pledged Tri Sigma after formal Rush Week in August, Cazedessus said she is confident the sorority will continue to grow.

She said she believes recolonization creates valuable leadership opportunities for new members and allows them to determine the chapter's image and future.

"I feel we have been very successful so far with the recolonization program. Tri Sigma's new members are very excited and are already talking about what goals they plan to accomplish. Although our pledge class is considerably smaller than most other houses', the new members are determined to build the house with positive leadership," she said.

Cazedessus believes Tri Sigma has a lot to offer other women at K-State, so the organization is targeting all women on campus, regardless if they have a lower grade point average or previously chose not to go through formal Rush.

Most sororities have a GPA requirement of 2.9, but Tri Sigma only requires women to have a 2.2 GPA when participating in Rush. Joining the house presents a great opportunity to those women who would like to be involved immediately, Cazedessus said.

Tri Sigma's membership development department chose chapters from Southwest Missouri State University and Emporia State University to represent the Tri Sigma sorority during the 1996 Rush Week because there were no active members from the K-State Tri Sigma chapter.

On Open House Day, membership development vice president Mary Barbee explained the reorganization process to the rushees and encouraged them to ask any questions. Although Cazedessus said she believes recolonization is a positive process, she also knows the idea scares many women.

"We have been very honest about restructuring the house, and we invite any questions women might have. We want Tri Sigma to become a strong and healthy organization. Fortunately, many people have been very helpful during these changes."

Team sign-ups starting now

■ Flag football and volleyball top list of intramurals, but sports for individuals can be found as well.

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

With new and exciting additions at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex last year, more people came out to the Rec Complex. The increase led to more people's participating in intramurals.

The same is expected this fall.

"With the expansion last year, we saw an increase in numbers at the Rec of 25 to 30 percent," Steve Martini, associate director of intramurals, said. "We expect that that increase will continue this year and trickle down to the intramural programs we offer."

In what appears to be a perennial trend, the two most popular sports during fall intramurals will be flag football and volleyball.

Last year more than 175 teams competed in the flag football competition. Flag football is made of three divisions: men's, women's and co-rec.

The most popular sport during fall continues to be volleyball. Volleyball is also offered in men's, women's and co-rec divisions.

Last year more than 275 teams competed in the volleyball competition.

Entries for volleyball are not taken until October. Martini said the later starting date of volleyball is a factor in its success.

"The deadline for flag football is really early," Martini said.

"You have a lot of new people here who haven't been to the Rec and maybe don't know about intramurals yet. Later in the semester with volleyball, people are more organized and are able to get teams together."

If team sports do not appeal to you, the Rec Complex offers a variety of individual events, including three-wall handball and racquetball, horseshoes, tennis, badminton, doubles volleyball and one-on-one basketball.

Intramural participants will see a new face this year at the Rec Complex. Ron Miller replaces Bryan Skinner as the assistant director of intramurals. Miller comes to K-State from Nebraska, where he spent two years as a graduate assistant.

"The intramural programs at Nebraska and K-State are very similar," Miller said. "The five same major sports are offered, and the size of the teams are about the same."

Miller said the Big 12 Conference has developed into one of the strongest intramural programs.

"All of the schools in the conference have good programs," he said.

"With the additions K-State has made, the conference now has probably five of the top 20 programs and facilities in the nation."

In addition to the recent renovations, the Rec Complex is in the process of adding new backstops and skinning the infields on the softball diamonds.

The new additions should be ready for softball play in spring.

"We want students to come out and get involved with intramurals," Martini said. "We're looking forward to another great year of intramurals."

All sports need student support, even women's

M.Y

Dan LEWERENZ

In all the hype surrounding the football season and Saturday's opening game, it's easy to forget the little things.

A coaching change here, a facility upgrade there — it's all part of a greater scheme to make K-State athletics stronger.

No, I'm not talking about the JumboTron. I'm talking about women's sports.

K-State women's basketball, track and field, cross country, golf, tennis and volleyball have made tremendous strides in recent years.

It's hard to say where such improvement has come from.

Certainly the recent emphasis on Title IX, a federal statute requiring educational institutions to provide equitable opportunities for women and men, has pushed several schools — including K-State — further and faster than they might have otherwise gone.

But Title IX shouldn't get all the credit. The increasing quality of America's female athletes and the rise of more women into administrative positions in all fields, including athletics, has helped ensure that women's sports are here to stay.

But here at K-State? What keeps them alive in one of the Big 12 Conference's smallest athletic departments? And, more importantly, what keeps making them better and better?

The answer is commitment. To understand that, one must know what (or, more appropriately, who) brought them to life in the first place.

Judy Akers began as K-State's women's basketball coach in 1968, the year K-State and Kansas became the first Big 8 schools to elevate women's basketball to the varsity level.

By the mid 1970s, Akers was coaching four sports and held the title of women's athletic director. She built Lady Kitten basketball into one of the nation's finest programs.

Akers left K-State in 1979, but what she started would live on. Many of K-State's programs suffered from the slim budgets of the 1980s, but all are in full recovery today.

Three things have brought about what might soon be a new golden age in K-State women's sports:

Coaching

Of the seven head coaches in K-State's women's programs, only tennis coach Steve Bietau predates my arrival in Manhattan. The steady progress he has made resulted in K-State's first all-American — Karina Kuregian in 1993-94 — and first NCAA bid last spring.

Track and field coach Cliff Rovelto was an assistant coach for the Wildcats when I arrived, assuming the top spot in 1993. Kristi Knight became the women's golf team's first coach, instead of sharing with the men, for the first time in 1995. And volleyball coach Jim Moore won a Division II national championship before becoming a Wildcat.

But perhaps the best examples of excellence in coaching are still untried — women's crew coach Jennifer Hale and women's basketball coach Debbie Patterson.

Hale has coached on the high-school, college and international levels, including three years as coach of the U.S. Junior National Team. Assistant Debra Morgan gave up a head coaching position to come to K-State.

Fans from the Southeastern Conference, women's basketball's powerhouse league, say Patterson was America's best assistant coach at Vanderbilt before K-State gave her a top job.

So what does she do for an encore? Only bring Kamie Ethridge (heir apparent to the best assistant coach position) from Vanderbilt, and take Bridget Bonds-Williams from Wisconsin, where they say she's head-coach material.

Even the third coach down the line, Sue Serafini, led Scranton University to the Division III NCAA tournament as an interim head coach.

Facilities

Whether it's the volleyball team's new locker rooms or the women's basketball team's new offices (not quite complete, but the blueprints will be on their way soon) or improvements near the boat house, K-State has recognized championship teams don't train in dilapidated conditions.

We're not at the end of the road — not by a long shot. But the fact remains K-State is getting better.

Attitude

There's more to winning than raising a recruiting budget (which, by the way, has also been done). If coaches, players and fans don't feel internal support, it's hard for them to perform.

But that support is here at K-State. Moore often attended basketball games, and former women's basketball coach Brian Agler was at almost every volleyball match. Athletic Director Max Urick went to the NCAA tennis regional in Lawrence, and Cindy Fox, assistant athletic director for marketing and senior women's administrator, is everywhere.

That kind of support means a lot to players who'll never see 42,000 fans at their games — and record crowds at women's events show it means something to the fans, too.

K-State's women's sports are on the rise, and all it takes to be a part of it is a little time, a willingness to cheer and some purple pride.

Check out fall tennis. Go to a regatta or a volleyball match.

Cheer on K-State women's athletes. After all, we're all Wildcats.

Keepin TRADITIONS ALIVE

■ Big 12 schools bring a rich history of tradition to the new conference. In with the new doesn't mean out with the old.

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

Expectations are high that the Big 12 Conference will be known through time for developing a tradition as one of the strongest conferences ever.

But before the Big 12 even began, many of the schools already had rich football traditions.

Texas Tech.

The Red Raiders have a tradition of ringing a bell that is carried on a trailer at all its home and away games.

The bell was given to the school from the Santa Fe Railroad and is used as a spirit-raiser.

They call ringing the bell "bangin' Bertha."

Baylor.

They call themselves the Bears. Baylor is the smallest university in the Big 12, with only 12,000 students enrolled.

The school colors are green and gold, chosen initially from a view of spring dandelions and green flowers.

Texas A&M.

Also known as the Aggies, A&M has a proven way to get its fans involved in games. The school selects student yell leaders who are voted on by the student body.

Five students — three seniors and two juniors — are selected to attend every game clad in white clothing. They lead the crowd, or "the 12th man," in fight cheers.

After every touchdown, Aggie men are supposed to kiss girls standing near them. This is a tradition that dates back to the early years of Aggie football.

The Aggies' mascot is a full-bred American collie named Reveille.

Texas.

The Longhorns make their home at the biggest stadium in the Big 12. Memorial Stadium holds 75,512 fans.

Texas' mascot is named Bevo XIII, and its team colors are burnt orange and white.

Nebraska.

Possibly the most famous mascot in the Big 12 is Nebraska's Herbie Husker. The Huskers have sold out 208 consecutive home games.

Nebraska has a tradition of running out of a tunnel lined up as a team before each game. The team is usually led by Coach Tom Osborne, who boasts the title of being the winningest coach in college football.

Kansas.

The Jayhawks have a tradition known as "waving the wheat." Fans wave wheat in the stands after every Jayhawk scoring drive.

Colorado.

The Buffaloes are led onto the field at home games by an 11-year-old, 1,300-pound buffalo named Ralphie III.

Oklahoma State.

Known as Pistol Pete, the Cowboys' mascot leads its fans by provoking mischief and starting cheers among its fans.

It is also common at Oklahoma State to find tailgate parties with live music and trolleys that ferry fans from downtown areas to the stadium during home games at the Cowboys' Lewis Field.

Iowa State.

The school's athletes are called the Cyclones. The name was given to the school in the summer and early fall of 1895, when a large number of tornadoes wreaked havoc on the state of Iowa. At that time, tornadoes were more commonly called cyclones.

The Cyclones' mascot, however, is a cardinal displaying the school colors, cardinal and gold.

Although the Big 12 has not completed its first month of football existence, plenty of tradition already exists.

▶ SPECIAL OLYMPICS

Special Olympics, Big 12 form alliance for athletes

BRENT STOVER
sports writer

The start of the Big 12 Conference in 1996 also marks the beginning of a partnership between the new conference and the Special Olympics.

The Special Olympics recently became the official charity of the Big 12.

"It came about last spring at the inaugural Big 12 meetings," said Julie Dorn, assistant director of championships for the Big 12 Conference.

The partnership is still in its early stages, but it is already showing signs of success for both parties involved.

The theme for Special Olympics is "Training for Life." As student-athletes in college train in life skills, so too do Special Olympians who learn the skills they need to become self-sufficient in their everyday lives.

"It's a perfect fit all-around in the long run," Dorn said.

Events are planned for Big 12 athletes to speak to Special Olympians as well as work with them on their athletic skills.

Athletes from the Special Olympics had the opportunity to participate in each of the Big 12 Football Media Days.

The Special Olympics is hoping to get involved with different clinics and presentations at the Big 12 Championships in each of the different collegiate sports.

Special Olympians more than 8 years old take part in 22 sports, including basketball, swimming and soccer.

Although sports are fun and exciting for Special Olympians, they are also sometimes difficult because of mental and physical handicaps. Naturally, many of these Olympians hold collegiate athletes in high regard.

"A lot of these Special Olympians really look up to the college athletes," Dorn said. "The long-range goal is to get athletes of all of the different sports involved, as far as volunteering."

At Colorado, the partnership is already off and running. Football coach Rick Neuheisel serves on the board of directors for the Special Olympics.

With the Big 12 era just beginning, it can already be seen that there is more to this conference, and to life, than sports.

▶ VOLLEYBALL

Luther passes on surgery

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

Kelli Luther isn't going to give up.

Luther, a senior volleyball player in her last year of eligibility, was looked at to provide leadership at the beginning of the season. She was also one of the main offensive threats on the team.

But earlier this month, Luther tore the anterior cruciate ligament in her left knee during a practice session. Instead of ending her collegiate volleyball career, Luther has decided to try to rehabilitate her knee and make a comeback this season. She will try to avoid surgery until season's end.

Coach Jim Moore said Luther's efforts to play this season could help pump up his team.

"Kelli is just such a strong leader for our team," Moore said. "It might work as an emotional boost to us as she tries to make her comeback."

Luther appeared in 40 games last year for the Cats after transferring from Wisconsin. She finished the season hitting .069 with 38 kills.

Book exchange helps students find textbooks

SETH GURSS
staff reporter

Textbooks continue to get more expensive each year, and the return price continues to drop.

Even though a Rhode Island World Wide Web site has offered a solution, I wouldn't count on a good one anytime soon.

The Student Book Exchange has started a Web site that allows students to buy and sell used books all over the country.

The idea is students who are looking for savings on books for college courses can either advertise their used books on the Web for a higher price than they would receive at a bookstore, or they can search for a book they need for a class at a lower price than a bookstore would offer. It cuts out the bookstores.

Unfortunately, there are a couple of drawbacks.

First, this is a new Web site. Not counting the two times I looked through it, only 153 people have accessed it.This means there aren't many books being advertised. In fact, only 29 were on the list as of Tuesday.

Basically, the chances of finding a match are not good.

The second drawback is simple. What happens if you find a match? How do the two parties make the exchange when they may live on opposite ends of the country?

The only thing the Student Book Exchange does is locate the book; therefore, it is up to the two parties to figure out a way to make the exchange. This leads to one minor problem: fraud.

If someone looking for a specific book mails the agreed-upon price to the bookseller, how can that person be sure the book will be sent in return for the money?

Unfortunately, they can't, because there is not a regulating institution that oversees the exchanges.

Even though there are drawbacks to this type of book exchange, it is potentially an excellent solution to a problem that continues to raise the cost of a college education.

According to the Student Book Exchange, it is working on a search engine that will make the process of finding a book easier for students.

Undoubtedly, if more books become available to students and a better way to make exchanges is created, students all around the country can say goodbye to the ripoffs at bookstores.

The address for the Student Book Exchange is (www.bookrecycling.com)

Desert monastery has home page for Internet

Every week, Darin Siefkes, senior in history, will review various sites on the World Wide Web in this space.
Do you know an interesting site, have a question or want to comment?
E-mail Siefkes at wings@ksu.ksu.edu.

It has always been a dream of mine to give up this crazy electronic existence I live and join a monastery away from the Internet. I usually feel this way after a bad computer crash.

But it never can be, because even God is on the Net.

The Monastery of Christ in the Desert
(http://www.christdesert.org/pax.html)

If you thought monks only sit around and pray all day, you have another thing coming. These monks are online with an interactive cutting-edge home page.

To begin with, users must choose from simple-text-only, graphic-enhanced or JavaScript versions of this home page.

All versions are well worth the visit to take a look at a modern monastery.

The graphics are beautiful, with a hint of the medieval.

So.as visitors are taught about St. Benedictine and his rule, they are being wowed by beautiful hand-painted artwork.

What I'm most impressed with is that like the monks of old, these men are dedicated to preserving works of art and knowledge.

In earlier days that meant copying the Bible as well as work from Aristotle, Plato and other greats from the ancient world.

But instead of hand-copying books, modern monks are writing home pages.

This page still needs work. It is a little buggy, and the help section doesn't seem to work yet.

But despite its faults, it is a site all surfers need to see at least once.

Workers have less protection than they think

KELLY FURNAS
staff reporter

The complexities of employee rights are something Cornell Mayfield deals with every day.

Mayfield, director of Manhattan's human resources department, said a common problem is many people confuse employers' policies with state or federal law.

"A lot of what people assume are law are actually private employers' practices," he said.

"For example, at (City Hall), employees can have a 15-minute break every four hours that they work. Other employers require that you take two 15-minute breaks in a day.

"The fact is, there is no law which requires an employer to give you a break."

> "I could work you 24 hours a day, seven days a week, as long as I pay you overtime."
> • CORNELL MAYFIELD
> DIRECTOR OF HUMAN RESOURCES

In addition, an employer is not forced to give an employee time to eat lunch, nor does an employer have to give an employee sick leave or vacation time.

"I could work you 24 hours a day, seven days a week, as long as I pay you overtime," he said.

Overtime pay is a matter of concern for many employees, Mayfield said. State law requires that an employee be paid time-and-a-half for any hours worked in addition to a 40-hour work week.

But state law often contradicts federal law, Mayfield said.

"There are many state laws that aren't common knowledge because they are not in practice," he said. "For example, if you look at the minimum wage for the state of Kansas, you'd probably be surprised."

According to the Kansas Department of Human Resources, the state's minimum wage is $2.60, as opposed to the $4.25 federal minimum wage.

Besides the conflicts between state and federal laws, there are also some jobs that are exempt from the Fair Labor Standards Act, which deals with issues such as overtime.

For example, maids who work in households are not required to receive overtime pay, and any employee who works on salary does not receive overtime pay.

However, if hourly employees are forced to go to staff meetings or wait at home on call, they must be paid for that time.

"We receive a lot of calls in terms of wages," Mayfield said. "Some people claim they worked so many hours and haven't got paid, or that they lost something and had pay deducted from their check."

Mayfield said employers cannot legally take money out of an employee's check for losing money from a register or having merchandise stolen from them.

Wage disputes such as this are usually taken care of informally, he said.

Mayfield said if workers have a problem with employers, they should talk to them or refer to the personnel manual.

"If the Department of Human Resources finds out about it, they will contact the employer informally. If they have to settle it formally, the employer will be penalized a certain percentage," he said.

However, Mayfield said labor problems in Manhattan are limited.

"I think it's relatively well-off in Manhattan," he said, "because I haven't seen any big cases against employers."

Nevertheless, Mayfield said any labor-related questions or concerns can be taken up with the Department of Human Resources.

"Human resources can either answer your question or tell you what federal or state agency you should get in contact with," he said.

Wildcat plates could start trend

JILL STORY
staff writer

No word yet on whether Willie will get one for his spirit-mobile, but the rest of the Wildcat set seems to be enthused about the new K-State license plates.

More than 850 of the silver plates sporting a purple Powercat and the word K-State make up the initial order, said Brad Beets, vice president of the KSU Alumni Association.

"But you won't see them on vehicles until January or February," Beets said.

The deadline for the first set of plates was Aug. 15. Interested Cat fans who returned an application and a $50 royalty fee to the Alumni Association by the deadline were sent vouchers.

After Jan. 1, those with vouchers can take them to the county treasurer's office, pay the state special-plate fee of $45 and any other applicable fees and get their K-State plates.

"We're hoping that this will springboard and keep going and going.

"The most exciting thing about the whole project is that it is a great opportunity for the University to have additional scholarship dollars that weren't there before," Beets said.

Out of the $50 yearly royalty fee, $45 goes directly into the University's general academic scholarship fund to help deserving students.

The first plate order provided more than $38,000 of scholarship money to the fund.

"Over the next five years the plate fees could generate over $200,000 worth of scholarships," Beets said.

The 1994 Kansas Legislature approved the idea of the university license-plate program to help college students. K-State is the first and only university participating in the program.

"Most state universities are interested, but they are waiting to see what we do with our program," Beets said.

Acoustic rock returns to All Faiths Chapel

JESS C. LOUK
staff reporter

Acoustic rock 'n' roll will bounce off the All Faiths Chapel walls for the second time in as many years tonight.

The two-man band Lost and Found will bring its live act back to All Faiths Chapel at 7 p.m. The show is sponsored by Lutheran Campus Ministry and Habitat for Humanity.

Michael Bridges and George Baum are Lost and Found. The two have been together for more than 15 years. Bridges plays guitar and sings, while Baum handles the piano duties. Their live performances have been described as audience-interactive.

"Their show is full of high energy and very rowdy," the Rev. Jayne Thompson said.

Bridges said Baum's first concert tour was via bicycle. They rode their bikes from their home state of New York to California and back. They have stayed busy musically ever since, releasing more than a dozen demos and compact discs.

Lost and Found plays about 150 concerts a year, Thompson said. The band's audiences include colleges, youth groups and high schools. Part of Bridges and Baum's act includes amusing anecdotes about interaction among humans. The two also address some serious life situations such as anorexia, relationships and racism in their show.

Although Bridges and Baum are active Lutherans, they hesitate to call themselves Christian musicians, Thompson said.

"People who don't necessarily consider themselves Christians can still enjoy George and Michael as people and musicians."

STUDENTS CONTINUE studies in Farrell Library's cathedral room since the completion of the restoration of the four murals. The murals, originally painted in 1934, were completely restored about two weeks ago.

Students use new Farrell

LILLIAN E. BEEBE
staff reporter

Students should notice Farrell Library looks different this fall than it did in May. The entrance has moved, the building's iron skeleton is being covered with Kansas limestone, and the west and south portions of the building are open for student use.

The southwest entrance, across from Lafene Health Center, is temporary and will be used for about six months.

"The entrance was moved so we could afford the contractor to come in and do stonework to the north wall," Bob Kreger, Farrell Library building manager, said.

The final main entrance will be the large archway running along the south wall, Kreger said.

To deal with the confusion, Kreger said he estimates four to six library personnel will be circulating on or around the main staircase by the entrance to answer questions.

"Everyone that comes in that door will be unfamiliar with where they are," Kreger said.

The service is based on student response and should only be needed for the first part of the semester, he said.

Kreger said students should feel free to ask any staff in the building any questions they have. Even with adequate signs, there will still be questions, and personnel have been briefed for this, he said.

About 90 percent of the library staff and departments are in temporary locations but are still fully operational, Kreger said.

The west and south portions of the building are open for use this fall.

In the west section, the first floor houses the circulation office and sorting department. The second floor contains offices, the reference collection and development department. Third and fourth floors are study areas for students with reference computers on each floor.

The south section also emphasizes study and research areas. The first and fourth floors are study areas. The second, third and fourth floors also have reference computers. The third floor houses the reference collection.

"The emphasis in the entire remodel was to meet students' needs," Kreger said.

Students can access the library system through their own computers in the study carrels. Study carrels are equipped with lights and computer access.

A student can get into the mainframe, but it is only through the library system, said Amal Dissanayake, student intern with Computing and Network Services.

Dissanayake said he feels the library renovation will make his graduate work in electrical and computer engineering easier.

"It's a very convenient thing with all the resources and more space," he said.

The renovation is close to being on schedule, Kreger said. Construction crews made up for time lost this last spring. The crews scheduled around the rain this summer and did indoor work to catch up, Kreger said.

The expansion and renovation of Farrell Library is a $30-million project that has had three years of actual building time and is one year away from completion, Kreger said. The project is within one or two months of the projected schedule, he said.

The next phase in the project deals with the east part of the building. Kreger said he anticipates having new shelving installed on the fourth floor the first two weeks of September.

Books from the fifth and sixth floors will be moved to the fourth floor, Kreger said.

The opening of the fourth floor will provide another set of restrooms. The library still has limited restrooms for the number of people that visit the building, Kreger said.

The tentative schedule for the rest of the east portion of the building includes having the third floor ready in mid-October, the second floor around Thanksgiving and the first floor around the end of the year or early 1997, Kreger said. The fifth and last floor, for administrative offices, should be ready by March or April 1997, when the project is due.

This expansion will bring Farrell Library's total floor space to more than 350,000 square feet with the addition of 153,000 square feet to the building. Farrell library was constructed in three phases in 1927, 1955 and 1971.

The current expansion is being built around three sides of Farrell Library, making it one structure. Kansas limestone was used in much of the original construction and is being used in the renovation to help achieve continuity.

Welcome Back concert to kick off semester

ABBI HAKE
staff reporter

Alternative rock mixed with a hint of ska will fill City Park's stage Friday night.

K-State's radio station, KSDB-FM 91.9, will feature Kill Creek, Fastball, MU330 and Manhattan's Ultimate Fake Book in its third annual Welcome Back Concert.

The free event will kick off the weekend as the Wildcats prepare for their Saturday afternoon football battle.

"It's a perfect event to tie in with," Jennifer Durand, DB92 promotions director, said.

Although last year's concert only drew 300-400 people, Durand said she expects about 1,000 people this year.

"The scheduling of it has worked out a whole lot better than last year's. It's the first week of classes, so we could get greater attendance and time for us to promote it more," Durand said.

Eric Melin, DB92 music director, booked the bands for the five-hour concert.

"All the bands are really good. Three of them are nationally touring bands with record deals. All the bands have records out," Melin said.

At 5 p.m., Ultimate Fake Book will hit the stage debuting three new songs not featured on its homemade cassette. Ultimate Fake Book's current singles are "Wrestling Leap Year" and "All the New Poisons."

"Ultimate Fake Book is definitely a local favorite," Durand said.

Bill McShane, guitarist and singer, said the band has a compact disc in its future. He said recording should begin at the end of September, and a CD is due out in December.

Fastball, a trio from Austin, Texas, will be second in line to appear on stage. The band's debut album, "Make

CHARLESTON, S.C. — All four female cadets at the Citadel made it through physical-fitness tests Wednesday, unlike five of their male counterparts, who dropped out in the third day of drilling.

Five dropouts in a class of 581 is similar to previous years, school spokesman Terry Leedom said. Last year, 33 cadets left during the first week, including Shannon Faulkner, who became the first woman cadet under court order.

The presence of women might discourage some men from leaving, Leedom said.

"I imagine if I called home from here and said 'I want to quit,' and my father asked how many women had dropped out, and I said 'none,' he would probably say, 'I think you ought to hang in a bit longer,' " he said.

The Citadel willingly opened its gates to women this year after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Virginia Military Institute's all-male policy was unconstitutional. VMI and the Citadel were the only all-male state military colleges in the nation.

Leedom would not discuss how the women did on Wednesday's tests.

"It's not so important what they did. The key thing is they finished, and we have now something to evaluate," he said.

The commandant of cadets, Col. Joe Trez, said he was pleased with the fitness tests because no cadets gave up on themselves.

While the women are disciplined like the men, they will be judged by different fitness standards.

They must run two miles in less than 18 minutes, 54 seconds, while the men have only 15 minutes, 54 seconds. Women must do 18 push-ups and 50 sit-ups in two minutes each; men must do 42 push-ups and 52 sit-ups. The four women passed these tests Wednesday.

Students who do not meet standards take remedial training.

Archer has a background in fire safety and firefighting and a bachelor of science degree in fire science administration from the University of Maryland.

Lambert said when the new position became available, Archer decided it would be more suitable for him.

Lambert said there was no set date when a permanent director would be hired. He said there will be a search committee of faculty, staff, students from various campus groups and continuing-education representatives.

After the committee is formed, national advertising should begin in November or December. Applicants will send their résumés and go through a screening process.

"They will be looking for someone with experience in running a parking operation, preferably at an academic institution, but not necessarily," Lambert said.

Your Mama Proud," mixes pop and punk. It was released June 11 and features 14 songs.

When describing the type of music the band plays, Miles Zuniga, guitarist and vocalist, said he likes to compare it to a candy bar.

"A lot of it is really fast. It's pretty crunchy. It's got a lot of nougat and caramel filling. It sort of keeps evolving," Zuniga said.

Durand said of all the bands, Fastball might appeal to the most people.

"Fastball is the most radio-friendly," Durand said.

Kill Creek, a Lawrence band sporting the new album "Proving Winter Cruel," precedes the headlining band, MU330. "Proving Winter Cruel," the band's second album, followed its 1994 debut album, "St. Valentine's Garage."

Kill Creek played at the Welcome Back Concert two years ago.

"Kill Creek was too good and too popular to ignore," Melin said.

Traveling the countryside to make a stop in Manhattan, MU330 will top the show off with its seven-piece ska band from St. Louis.

"The band's different than any we've ever had," Durand said.

Durand said he hopes this year's concert will expose people to some good music and to the radio station.

"We want to introduce all the students to the radio station, so they see that we're actually doing something in the community," Durand said.

SGA funds still missing after probe

SARAH LUNDAY
senior staff writer

Somebody has reached into the Student Governing Association's piggy-bank and taken more than a few pennies.

During the summer, a classified employee — who has been identified as a secretary in the Student Governing Association office — was dismissed after University administrators discovered money was embezzled from the Student Governing Association's foundation account.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, told student senators Thursday night that University administration does not know how much money was taken from the account or what the long-term effects of the missing money will be on student groups.

> "Organizations are relying on dollars that aren't there. We have set up a way that the deficit doesn't affect the groups this year."
> • PAT BOSCO
> DEAN OF STUDENT LIFE

"We think that funds from student organizations were misappropriated," Bosco said.

The Office of Student Activities and Services is undergoing an internal audit, which will help determine what money is missing, Bosco said.

"Organizations are relying on dollars that aren't there. We have set up a way that the deficit doesn't affect the groups this year," Bosco said.

Student Senate will be working with the University controller's office to ensure that money is there for senators to allocate money and organizations to program decisions this fall. Bosco said the investigation includes reviewing the office's accounts, which are not complete.

"Part of the pieces of the puzzle would be a full accounting of where our accounts are, and we don't have that," Bosco said, explaining why he doesn't know how much money is missing.

He did say it was likely that only one person was involved in the embezzlement — which apparently resulted from a breakdown of checks and balances within the department.

"The checks and balances that were in place were manipulated," Bosco said.

The employee who was dismissed had general clerical and accounting responsibilities for the student activity fee accounts, and Bosco said the employee was able to use a photocopy machine to forge signatures. Those signatures were the key to accessing otherwise off-limit accounts.

Last night was not a night to be silent.

K-State fans of all ages gathered for the Purple Power Play on Poyntz to show their enthusiasm and support for the Wildcat football team.

The Awesome Banner Contest offered fans a chance to appear in KTKA-TV's video package for Saturday's game. The six banners were judged by five K-State assistant athletic coaches based on creativity and crowd response.

"About to Become Cat food" was the winning banner, created by Bob Lufkin, senior in life science, and Chris Limbird, senior in electrical engineering and physics.

Lufkin and Limbird heard about the contest on the radio and spent about 20 hours on the project.

Lufkin and Limbird received a VIP package for the Oklahoma game. The package includes two tickets, a parking pass, game programs, a pregame press-box tour and an autographed football.

"Everything is cool," Lufkin said. "But we'll have to brawl for the football."

Lufkin and Limbird also have a surprise they will not reveal for the crowd at Saturday's game.

All they would hint is that it is yellow and not to be missed.

"The banner was good," Limbird said, "but the game will be even better."

Fans had a distinctive way of showing their Wildcat spirit. Larry Bunce, graduate student in psychology, waits to reveal his purple pride until after the Wildcats have scored 30 points.

"Larry drops his pants and dances in his K-State boxers," Scott Carlson, fourth-year veterinary medicine student, said.

Carlson said many of the fans know Bunce and chant his name when he appears in the stands.

Before Bunce bares his boxers, he and his friends paint themselves in purple and hang the opposing team's mascot from a noose.

Senate sheds divisive image in 1st meeting

SARAH LUNDAY
senior staff writer

Call it the changing of the guard.

A breath of fresh air drifted through the Student Senate meeting Thursday night.

The short meeting proved to be a stark contrast to some Senate meetings at the end of last spring.

While much of last year's Senate argued with the student body president and vice president on fee allocations, much of this year's Senate voted for or worked on the campaign of the new student body president and vice president.

Student Senate

"In the past, there's been a big push for user fees," Aubrey Abbott, Senate chair, said. "I'm not sure this year."

There are also a lot of new faces active in student government.

"I think we'll have a whole new outlook," Abbott said. "We'll have the clean-slate attitude."

The new outlook could also lead to a freer flow of money to campus organizations such as Lafene Health Center and Student Publications Inc., former Senate chair John Potter said.

"To be honest, I'm scared about this year," Potter said. He said he fears this year's Senate will operate like an open cash register. Potter is not involved in student government this year.

During the three years Abbott has been active in Senate, she said she noticed a division among Senate members. Thursday night, there was more cohesion, she said.

Student Body Vice President Aaron Otto stood before the senators and commended them on the quietest, smoothest-running first Senate meeting he has seen during the four years he has been involved in student government.

Patrick Carney, arts and sciences senator, said last year's Senate appeared ineffective because there was a lot of internal fighting.

"I think there's much more of a willingness to work together and more willingness to compromise," Carney said.

Student senators and the executive branch, including the student body president and vice president, have named similar goals for the year. Both support making teacher evaluations available for all students to review, reorganizing student government and increasing campus safety.

Semester's early weeks prime time for fraudulent financial-aid offers

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

College students are easy targets for credit cards, phone companies, music clubs and magazine prescriptions. With little income and sky-high bills, the word free is a sure attention-getter.

Unfortunately, financial-aid companies aren't excluded from the list. More and more students are losing money to financial-aid companies that offer good deals.

For More Information
Contact the Better Business Bureau at (913) 232-0454.

Jolene Moreland, senior in animal science industry, lost $94 to a financial-aid company because she didn't do the footwork involved.

Moreland called a number she saw in an ad in the Collegian last fall for Academic Investment Money.

AIM told her it would guarantee $1,500 in scholarships and grants. However, there was a $94 charge to find out what she qualified for.

Until AIM received Moreland's check, the company wouldn't tell her how much she qualified for.

Next, she needed to fill out the forms for each scholarship or grant for which she wished to apply.

Moreland said her paperwork got lost in the mail until May, and all the scholarships were gone by then.

Student Financial Services is one company advertising free financial aid. When students call its number, they are told the company is based in Seattle and offers financial-aid assistance, regardless of income and grades.

The company says that for $69.95, it will offer a written guarantee of $300 in aid or your money back. All it needs is a credit-card number.

Student Financial Assistance advertisements are distributed in the bags in the K-State Union Bookstore.

Manager Kay Farley said she has no control over what comes in the bags.

The National Association of College Stores Bag Company determines what is sent in the bags but could not be reached for comment.

Jack Taylor, assistant director of service for student financial assistance, said the office tells students who ask about these companies it is probably not a wise investment and strongly urges them not to do it. Taylor said it was easy for a scam operation to get started because all potential scam artists need is a post-office box number and a phone number. Then they can collect the money and move to another spot.

"Financial aid can point them (students) toward the right direction, instead of companies that are one day in Delaware, the next day in Rhode Island," Taylor said.

Taylor said companies often say their services are free, then give students the names and numbers of companies that will eventually charge them.

Taylor said a common rule students should follow is if companies charge more that $35, students should question it. He said database checks on scholarships should only cost $15.

Taylor said the Free Application for Student Financial Assistance and a new scholarship search called College Aid Sources for Higher Education are two applications available at financial aid. He said if these two means aren't enough, students should come by financial aid first for some free advice.

ASHLEY WEEKLY

A memorial service was held Thursday at First Presbyterian Church for Beatrice D. Wentzel, 64.

Wentzel died unexpectedly Saturday. She had served as an administrative officer in the Office of the Provost for 17 years.

Wentzel had full management for commencement. She also helped with organizational groups for the Corporation of Technology. Wentzel was recently working on maintaining and adding to campus databases.

Wentzel

Elizabeth A. Unger, vice president for academic services and technology, worked closely with Wentzel.

"Beatrice had a maturity about her in order to make a good judgment. I could count on her to do the right thing. She made me look good," Unger said.

Wentzel was described by many as a woman with a lot of energy.

"I could not believe it when I found out her age," Unger said, adding that Wentzel kept up with everyone.

Colleagues of Wentzel described her as a woman that made everything look so easy because of her tremendous energy. Wentzel never had an unkind word for anyone, Unger said.

Debbie Van De Velde, administrative assistant to the president, said she liked Wentzel because of all the positive things she said about K-State.

Lafene determines goals

JACQUELINE BONE
staff reporter

Despite the war over student health privilege fees last year, Lafene Health Center is still going strong and looking forward to serving students.

Lafene's Student Health Advisory Committee met Thursday to introduce new members and plan this year's itinerary.

A new public-relations committee will come up with ideas to promote Lafene and its services. They are considering publishing a brochure with information on the staff at Lafene and visiting greek houses and residence halls.

"We're just brainstorming. This is new," Amy Donahy, chairwoman of SHAC, said.

In addition to the Public Relations Committee, SHAC will form committees to address issues such as the student health privilege fee and student health insurance.

The health center was recently accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations.

The Joint Commission awards accreditation to only a handful of health centers it surveys in the United States.

It surveys centers using a set of stringent guidelines. Lafene was awarded accreditation with commendation by the Joint Commission.

"Lafene Health Center must follow very strict guidelines and standards, especially in regard to the quality of care, in order to be awarded an accreditation," said Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene.

"And not only were we accredited, we were commended for our care of patients and management of the clinic."

Despite this news, Lafene was forced to cut its hours because of lack of funds. It was previously open from 8:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m. Mondays through Fridays.

Now the clinic closes at 6:30 p.m. It does stay open during the lunch hour and is open on weekends.

Lack of sufficient funds caused Lafene to be unable to fill a physician's position this year.

Last year, about 12,600 students used Lafene, and about 62,000 office visits were serviced. The number of students projected to use the facility this year is not expected to decline.

Expenditures, on the other hand, are expected to decline about 10 percent this year, and generated revenue is projected to increase about 28 percent from last year.

Part of this is due to the increase in the student health privilege fee. That topic is scheduled to be addressed in future SHAC meetings.

McVeigh denied media access

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — A request by Oklahoma City bombing suspect Timothy McVeigh to hand-pick journalists for interviews is an attempt to influence potential jurors and should be rejected, a prosecutor said Thursday.

Prosecutor Joseph Hartzler asked U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch in a court filing to deny the request.

McVeigh is not seeking a trial based on evidence, Hartzler said, but the court's endorsement of an attempt to influence the jury pool through an external presentation.

McVeigh and Terry Nichols are charged with federal murder and conspiracy in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building. The blast killed 168 people and injured more than 500 others.

If convicted, each could face the death penalty. A hearing is scheduled Oct. 2 to hear arguments on whether separate trials should be held.

McVeigh has granted four interviews since his arrest. His attorney, Stephen Jones, said the interview plan is an attempt to get accurate information out about his client.

Reid Neureiter, an attorney for Nichols, said the issue could hurt his client. If McVeigh is allowed to talk to the media, the attorney said, Nichols could be forced to make his own public response.

McVeigh's attempts also could make it difficult to find an open-minded jury, Neureiter said.

Hartzler said the media request hinders the goal of having the case tried soon before impartial jurors whose verdicts will be based on the trial evidence rather than media broadcasts.

IN OUR OPINION

Students should look out for financial-aid scams

When funds are low and you've already donated your monthly plasma limit, that "free financial aid" postcard that fell out of your textbook starts to look pretty tempting.

Many students have been scammed into writing checks for almost $100 for their free financial assistance.

WHY WE CARE

Students are often targets for consumer scams. What seems like an easy financial solution could end up putting you in more debt.

Students' financial desperation often makes them easy targets for shifty credit-card and scholarship companies.

One clue for those considering enlisting the services of one of these companies would be that the company charges a fee.

If the offer says it's free, but you're told later that there is a small charge for the company's services, you need to think twice about using it.

If you're looking for easy answers or some quick cash to solve your financial woes, do some legwork and research for yourself.

If you're not sure about the legitimacy of a company, call the K-State Office of Financial Assistance or the Better Business Bureau to find out what you might be getting into.

There is really no reason why you would have to use any of these services.

The financial-aid office offers the Free Application for Student Financial Assistance and College Aid Sources for Higher Education, which will tell you if you're eligible for scholarship, federal grants and loans.

You can also go to the library and check out the scholarship books that list every possible scholarship in the country, who is eligible, how much money they offer and how to apply for each. It might take some work, but you could save yourself future financial heartache.

The best advice would be that of David Horowitz, who said, "If it seems too good to be true, it probably is."

FOR MORE

- To check out a questionable financial opportunity call the Better Business Bureau at (913) 232-0454 or the K-State Office of Financial Assistance at 532-6420.

If you think you've been the victim of a scam, call the Consumer Protection Line at (913)296-2751.

Call me morbid, but with the opening of another semester, I'm not concerned with parking traumas, Rush Week tactics, or football tickets.

What I am wondering is how many women will be raped in the unspoken tradition of breaking in the freshman girls and which of the nameless passers-by (whom I'm sure I didn't smile at because I was looking down) will slit his wrists over a flunked exam.

I'm wondering how much of the financial aid I didn't qualify for will be spent at local bars and how many drunken brawls will erupt from it, and who won't be in class tomorrow because their study breaks didn't end until last call.

And I'm wondering how many Expository Writing 1 how-to papers will be titled "How to Get Hammered" or "How to Pick Up Chicks." I guess I don't have room to judge, considering that when my paper was graded, the instructor kept me after class to ask if it was some sort of cry for help.

Maybe if I had said it was, he would have referred me to the people at University Counseling Services, who had already rejected me because they said they couldn't help me in the five free visits they offer.

If you are traumatized by an undesirable grade or suicidal over a bad hair day, they're there for you, but make a habit of being suicidal, and they'll refer you elsewhere.

Although I'm quick-tempered at the walking billboards students sometimes seem and at overhearing conversations that consist of words such as nigger, white trash, or get some tonight, rarely a day passes that I am not grateful to be in school, but not because I think so highly of the university experience.

I am grateful because I don't see any comfortable options.

Minimum wage might have increased, but not enough to keep up with the cost of living.

My freshman year, I learned that people who can't balance their own brain cells shouldn't attempt to balance a checkbook. I recently finished making payments on that realization. That $20 bag of groceries cost me about $700.

Capitalism seems to be thriving, and how patriotic I feel to have contributed to an attorney's new silk pillows or bag of groceries.

I hope I don't sound bitter. I'm still a little disoriented, but still idealistic enough to believe that someday I could play a part in ending the exploitation of what you might call socioeconomic underdogs.

Being irresponsible, morbid and chronically late, and maintaining a general foot-in-mouth status, wasn't a phase limited to a natural adjustment period to campus life for me.

Instead, it has spread like a mental leprosy, making each semester more fertile for disaster.

Example: Too much of an open mind can be dangerous.

Curiosity killed the cat, but I've had an intimate and highly self-destructive relationship with curiosity. And I don't have eight more lives to spare.

Although I usually have my guard ready for the potentially addictive or just embarrassing surrender to the temptations of curiosity, this summer I learned that there is no such thing as harmless curiosity.

I called a psychic hotline. The sad thing is, I didn't believe in it before I called, and throughout the 20-minute conversation, it only confirmed my prior belief that these people took a general psychology course, practiced a deep, hypnotic voice and predicted love and money as specifically as a fortune cookie.

But I had to know how these psychic friends were making enough money to clog my illegal cable viewing with hours of infomercials.

I did find out when a Southwestern Bell representative called to ask if I wanted a 900-number block on my phone because someone had run up a $200 phone bill to a psychic hotline. She kindly asked if I had any idea who could have done it.

I told her I had no idea who could have done it and agreed to the block.

Despite my misfortune, I thought I could still afford to buy books when I got my deposit back from my last lease, but because I tried to be diplomatic and not complain about the problems in the apartment when I moved in, the landlord decided to keep my deposit and blamed me for everything that had been wrong with it.

Growing up can be expensive, especially if you can't afford a lawyer.

When such turbulence of the academic and the not-so-academic world gets overwhelming, I try to keep sort of a reality checklist to keep things in perspective. (That's also effective prevention for scaring my professors or making them think I'm looking for a surrogate therapist.)

I use this technique as sort of an anchor of anonymity to restore the comfort of being insignificant.

For example, when I've been awake for 48 hours studying and then slept through the make-up exam, I try to remember that somewhere a caterpillar has just awakened as a butterfly. And somewhere beneath me, an ant is crawling by on its merry way, completely oblivious to my grade point average or premenstrual melodrama.

And somewhere else, some kid is waiting for the Tooth Fairy, and some other kid has just stopped believing in the Tooth Fairy, and some other people just got their first dentures.

And someone is laughing, and nobody else knows why. And somewhere the Big Macs and Whoppers are having their Last Supper.

And somewhere, my favorite fourth-grade teacher is dying, and some kid just found out what nuclear war is, and a moth just flew into a windshield.

And someone has given up, and someone else is done giving up, and somewhere someone is quoting Christ, and someone else is quoting Jerry Seinfeld, and a branch has fallen from a tree, and someone has gone to sleep and won't wake up.

And someone can't remember my name.

Life's answers lie in the simple questions

MY

Jeremy STEPHENS

College. The seven-letter work your mother did want you to say.

Do not ask me what seven-letter C-word she didn't want you to say.

You're in college now, so you should be able to figure that out for yourself.

While growing up, I remember being reminded repeatedly that if I was going to do something in life, I needed to go to college.

Having been in college for a few years, and with one degree under my belt, I can say one thing: I now own a piece of paper worth $25,000.

But now what?

As a freshman, I looked forward to getting out of college, changing the world, establishing global peace and visiting every major-league ballpark in the United States.

As a senior, I look back and try to recall what I have learned.

It occurred to me I don't know a whole lot more now than I did when I began, except for the fact that the road out to Interstate 70 and Farrell Library will be under construction until they are swallowed up by the earth.

So what is the purpose of college?

Is it to find your lost self that wandered away while at recess in the sixth grade, but got directions to the school of your choice?

Maybe it is to discover the meaning of life, the universe and everything. I did, but I forgot to write it down.

To many people, the purpose of college is to simply provide filler between high school and real life. I use the word really lightly here, for if you are not living real life right now, you never will. While attempting to participate in every club, activity and social gathering, and trying to start or create 10 more, many college careers fly by and seem to end the day after they begin.

Most people are only in college for a few years, although there are always exceptions to the rule.

While you are here, slow down. Speed kills.

Many decades lie ahead, during which you will have plenty of time to join the real version of those 10 clubs in college you just couldn't squeeze into your schedule.

Our society is already obsessed with doing everything immediately.

Don't add to the problem. Enjoy Coca-Cola while you watch the grass grow.

This is not said to justify doing nothing, but to remind those whose most valuable possession is a daily planner that life is more than trips to get refill calendars.

Ask yourself the simple questions before the hard ones.

For example, will the Houston Astros win the National League pennant, and if so, how many home runs will Jeff Bagwell hit to the upper deck?

How embarrassed will the Jayhawks be after they lose to us this year?

Is Tiger Woods the next Jack Nicklaus? And, last but not least, will Dick Gephardt and Tom Daschele ever stop whining?

The hard questions become simple if you look at them closely.

In the meantime, take some advice on life from Nissan. Smile. Enjoy the ride.

The journey has just begun.

Words of consolation for displaced football fans

Editor,

This gray-hair remembers the days in the 1960s when you could have your choice for football seating in the old stadium.

Things picked up a lot with Lynn Dickey and company in the 1970s.

Although it offers little consolation to today's displaced students, a pleasant side-effect of K-State's current football popularity is that Nebraska fans can no longer consider a contest in Manhattan another home game.

STARS scholarship program

Editor,

The Collegian article "Hochhauser, Peterson define platforms" on Aug. 27 did not accurately or completely describe the state scholarship program I supported.

Because I know there will be much interest in the program on the K-State campus, I want to set the record straight.

The program is called Student Tuition Assistance Recognition Scholarship.

If the proposal passes the Kansas Legislature and the governor signs it, most Kansas high-school students with a 3.0 grade point average or better will be able to attend the Kansas college or university of their choice tuition-free.

To be eligible, a student's family must earn less than $75,000 each year. The program would be funded by interest earned on the state's idle funds.

I supported this initiative in the last legislative session and will continue to work for this passage.

I believe this program will encourage students to excel in high school, make higher education more affordable for most Kansans and help keep our good students in Kansas.

Your interest and efforts are needed to make this happen.

Please call me if you have any questions about STARS or would like to help lobby for it.

SENATOR BEN VIDRICKSEN, Senate assistant majority leader of Kansas, heaves the first shovel of dirt in the Harbin Hall ground-breaking for K-State Salina. Representatives of K-State and K-State-Salina were on hand to take part in the ceremony.

Salina to get new dorm

BREE BISNETTE

Ground was broken for the second residence hall at K-State-Salina Thursday afternoon. Equipped with golden shovels, eight contributors in the Harbin Hall building effort turned over the first shovels of dirt on the property where the facility will be constructed.

The two-story, 19,566-square-foot building will accommodate 98 students when its doors open in the fall of 1997. Each of the 50 rooms will have a data line for personal computers, a full bath, carpeting and thermostats. A computer lab will also be available in the basement.

The Salina campus had reached a ceiling in its expansion, said James Coffman, provost of K-State. The new dormitory will help overcome some of these limitations.

"We've seen a 42-percent increase in students on this campus since the merger between K-State and the Kansas College of Technology five years ago," Coffman said. "This additional student housing is the next necessary component to allow the growth of the campus to go on to the next level."

Dean of the College of Technology in Salina Jack Henry said the addition of Harbin Hall is something few visualized when the merger occurred in 1991.

"Five years ago, we had a shortage of students, not housing, and we had even fewer students who wanted to live on campus," Henry said. "So today's ground-breaking ceremony marks yet another milestone in our journey to transform this college campus from the old Air Force base look," he said.

With the addition of Harbin Hall, K-State-Salina is moving toward a more standard campus, Henry said.

"K-State-Salina is becoming more like the campus in Manhattan —a diverse population with more students right out of high school. This more-traditional campus environment is absolutely essential in our growth and our ability to attract more students," he said.

Matt Wagner, president of the Student Government Association at K-State-Salina, said he is excited about the atmosphere Harbin Hall will offer students.

"We can bring more young students together on the campus," Wagner said. "It will give students more of a sense of belonging to the campus. We can do activities and create friendly competitions between the two halls, which will help us grow and live together," he said.

The revenue for the residence hall was accumulated through a half-cent sales-tax increase that raised about $5.4 million along with the proceeds from a $2-million trust with the KSU Foundation established by Bill and Jo Harbin, said Sen. Ben Vidricksen, who attended the ceremony. Bill Harbin is a 1950 graduate of K-State in architectural engineering, and Jo Harbin was a student in human ecology.

"The Harbins' gift is both an enormous commitment and statement of confidence in the programs and people associated with Kansas State University and the College of Technology," said Gary Hellebust, the chief executive officer of the Foundation. "Their generosity and foresight will provide a modern, comfortable facility that will compliment the academic growth of K-State-Salina students."

Clinton accepts nomination, lists his term's achievements

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — In a Democratic convention finale filled with references to the next century, President Clinton offered himself Thursday night as the engineer of change and optimism for the next four years. "America is on the right track," he said.

Riding high in the polls, fresh from a triumphant four-day train ride through the vote-rich Midwest, Clinton claimed boasting rights to a litany of accomplishments achieved in part by changing what he called the old politics of Washington.

Clinton said his administration had made college more affordable, streets safer, water and lands less polluted, tax rates lower for middle-class Americans, jobs more plentiful and families more ready to cope with the coming century.

"Tonight, let us resolve to build a bridge to the 21st century, to meet our challenges, protect our basic values and prepare our people for the future," Clinton said. His speech was a forward-looking riff on rival Bob Dole's acceptance line of two weeks ago to be a "bridge to a time of tranquility, faith and confidence in action."

The president, in remarks prepared for delivery, was generally solicitous of Dole but drew sharp difference with the Republicans on their tax and budget plans. He argued — if only by inference — that Dole's $548-billion tax-cut plan would balloon the deficit and increase interest rates.

"We have an obligation to leave our children a legacy of opportunity, not debt," the president said. "So this is one area where I respectably disagree from my opponent. We should not bet the farm — and we certainly should not bet the country."

He also slammed Republican plans for balancing the budget. "As long as I am president, I will never allow cuts that devastate education for our children, pollute our environment, end guarantees of health care ... or violate our duty to our parents under Medicaid," he said. "Never."

In the speech, White House chief of staff Leon Panetta said Clinton would salute Dole's service to the country as a World War II veteran and longtime lawmaker. It is in keeping with internal polls that show Americans craving civility in government.

Bargains, buyer bewares, top picks for your draft

It's that time again. If you're like me, you've been waiting for it for more than a year.

I'm not talking about classes or even the Big 12 opener on Saturday. I'm talking about draft day in fantasy football. It is one of the season highlights for fantasy owners.

The adrenaline that goes through an owner on draft day is incredible. It cannot be explained. It must be experienced.

Shane MCCORMICK

It's the excitement of seeing a player you want fall into your lap.

It's also the disappointment of seeing a player you want be taken by the pick just before yours.

I've been a fantasy football player for over six years now. Every year, draft day is more exciting than the one before.

Many owners wait to have their draft until the day before the first regular-season game. To prepare you for your draft, I'm going to offer you some important draft-day advice. I'll give you my bargains, buyer-bewares, and top 10 players for this year's upcoming draft.

Bargains

These are players you should find in the mid-to-late rounds that could give your team some surprising scoring weeks.

1. Drew Bledsoe. Bledsoe will slip into many drafts because of his 13 touchdowns last year. Take into account that he played most of last year with a shoulder injury. With rookie speedster Terry Glenn and the league's easiest schedule, Bledsoe should post 25 - 30 touchdowns.

2. Jerome Bettis. The Pittsburgh Steelers took a draft-day gamble on this big bruiser. You should, too. Pittsburgh's rushing attack is a perfect fit for Bettis' rushing style. Expect Bettis to get the ball every time on the goal line and score about 10 touchdowns.

3. O.J. McDuffie. I am really high on this guy this year. Last year, McDuffie made huge strides, grabbing 62 receptions and eight touchdowns. With Irving Fryer's departure and Fred Barnett's injury, McDuffie should be quarterback Dan Marino's favorite target. Expect 10-12 touchdowns from this 26-year-old.

4. Karim Abdul-Jabbar. This rookie running back out of UCLA could be the draft's biggest sleeper this year. Jimmy Johnson loves to find a back and use him for about 30 carries a game. With the departure of Terry Kirby, look for Jabbar to find his way into the starting lineup. Jabbar could surprise you this year with about 8 TDs.

Buyer-Bewares

These are players that could break your heart when they don't post the numbers you want.

1. Isaac Bruce. Bruce surprised everyone last year with a 13-touchdown performance. Many owners will take Bruce with a first- or second-round pick. Don't let it be you. It will be difficult for Bruce to match that touchdown performance this season.

Why? Because he has Steve "I-can't-throw-the-ball-50-yards" Walsh throwing to him instead of Chris Miller. Bruce is worth a fourth-round selection, but don't waste a top pick on him. Expect six to eight touchdowns.

2. Jeff Hostetler. Do not — I repeat — do not take Hostetler as your No. 1 quarterback. Every year he is injury-prone. He is the king of injured quarterbacks. Battling injuries last year, Hostetler posted just 12 touchdowns. He's already scheduled to miss the season opener. Don't expect any more than 15 - 20 touchdowns.

3. Errict Rhett. In case you don't know, Rhett is holding out for more money. I don't expect Rhett to be signed until the third or fourth week of the season. When he does sign, it will take him another two or three Put aside all the preseason talk, the injuries and the distractions. It's time to play Big 12 football.

"I'm not nervous at all," senior Brian Kavanagh said. "I just can't wait for Saturday."

Kavanagh will get his first start as quarterback of the No. 21 Wildcats Saturday against Texas Tech in the first-ever conference game of the Big 12.

Even though his team is favored to win, Coach Bill Snyder said K-State cannot take the Red Raiders lightly, in particular, junior tailback Byron Hanspard.

Hanspard rushed for 1,374 yards last year and an astonishing 260 yards in last year's Copper Bowl.

"He's probably as fast as anyone we've lined up against," Snyder said. "You would try to compare him to someone from Nebraska, but he's not as physical. But he sure can run well."

> "We are extremely excited. We haven't lost any momentum. You can really feel the electricity here."
> • JASON JOHNSON WILDCATS CENTER

Snyder also said Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge will cause some problems for the Cats with his ability to do a variety of things on the field.

"He brings a lot of things to the field. He brings fear. He can throw the ball, and he sure can run," Snyder said. "He is a threat from sideline to sideline and up and down the field."

Trying to contain Lethridge will be a Cat defense with six new starters, including a new cornerback to replace injured Joe Gordon.

"I think there's a real sense of anticipation," Snyder said.

"People are anxious and excited to get it started, and our players are the same way."

Snyder said to expect Gordon back by the Oct. 5 Nebraska game.

"Joe's come along extremely well," Snyder said.

But despite key losses, K-State has drawn the respect of Red Raider coach Spike Dykes.

"They don't make any mistakes," Dykes said. "Everything they do, they do it well."

Kavanagh's 18-24, 242-yard performance in the Holiday Bowl, Dykes said, was a testament to the K-State program.

"For that boy to be the second-team quarterback, that's unbelievable," Dykes said.

"He really did a great job in that bowl game."

Center Jason Johnson said the team is still rolling off the Holiday Bowl victory.

"We are extremely excited. We haven't lost any momentum," Johnson said. "You can really feel the electricity here."

Netters begin season on road

JOHN BERGGREN

The volleyball team opens its season today and Saturday in Evanston, Ill., at the Holiday Inn Wildcat Invitational Tournament.

Coach Jim Moore said his team is ready to take step one in matching or bettering last year's 21-12 performance.

"We've practiced close to 100 hours now, and we're ready to play somebody on the other side," Moore said. "We'll know come Sunday how ready we actually are, but now we really just want to play somebody."

The Cats are slated to play Southwest Missouri State and Northwestern University today. Saturday, K-State will conclude the tournament against Rice and North Carolina State.

Of the four teams, Rice is the only squad K-State saw last year. The Wildcats swept the Owls in two meetings, 3-1 and 3-1.

K-State finished last season with the best record among the tournament's teams. Rice finished 1995 at 21-17, North Carolina State at 20-15, Southwest Missouri State at 16-12 and Northwestern at 5-25.

Moore said he didn't know much about the four teams his team will play.

"We played Rice last year, but they lost their top player," Moore said.

"It's not important how good the other teams are. It's important that we get better each game and know what we need to improve on.

"Now we're in a feeling-out process," Moore said. "We want to see how we react to stress and how we react to pressure."

Moore said how his team deals with the stresses and pressures was going to be important.

"At this level, the emotional and mental aspects of the game are the most important parts of the game," Moore said. "We've tried to put the girls in some stressful situations in practice, but the games will be the real test."

Living in a fantasy world: Football fans can call the shots

▪ Getting involved in fantasy leagues is easy and fun for fans. Here's what to do to start a fantasy football league.

BRENT STOVER

Fantasy football is quickly becoming one of the most popular sports in America.

That's fantasy football, as opposed to just plain old football. It's a sport anyone can take part in, no matter how athletically inclined you are. In other words, there is no expenditure of physical energy involved.

Fantasy football gives common football fans the opportunity to own, manage and coach their own football franchises.

Of all the different fantasy sports available, football has risen to the top.

"It's a lot of fun and makes the season a lot more interesting, especially the games where you don't like either team but your players are involved," John Corley, senior in marketing, said.

Corley is beginning his third season as a participant in fantasy football, having finished in fourth and second place in his league each of the past two seasons.

Although there are some basic ground rules, one of the greatest things about fantasy football is that fans can decide their own. There are also several variations to the sport, so there are some decisions to make as to the path to take.

The first step in organizing a fantasy football league is to get a group of friends together, choose a league commissioner and hold a draft.

> You look at who's hot, the team they're on, and how much opportunity they have to score.
> • JOHN CORLEY SENIOR IN MARKETING

At this point, members become NFL owners, and they must decide which players they want to draft.

"You look at who's hot, the team they're on and how much opportunity they have to score," Corley said.

In other words, it's good to get some background information on the players before deciding whom to draft. And there's help in finding the information.

"Fantasy football magazines rank the players at each position, based mostly on last year," Corley said.

Depending on how many owners a league has, it might want to split into two or more divisions.

It is a good idea to have between eight and 12 teams in a league, making sure there is an even number of teams, because each team will match up against another team every week.

In most leagues, each team will draft somewhere between 15 and 17 players, but it will usually start only seven of the players. Those seven starters usually include a quarterback, two running backs, two wide receivers, a tight end and a kicker.

In many leagues, the rosters consist of offensive players only. There are, however, more advanced leagues that draft defensive players.

This makes it more difficult to keep track of statistics, though, which brings up the next point — how the scoring works.

The league commissioner can decide the point value given to certain feats by players. The most basic scoring system gives six points to a running back who scores a touchdown, a quarterback who scores a touchdown or throws a touchdown pass, and a wide receiver or tight end who makes a touchdown reception. Three points are awarded to a kicker who makes a field goal. However, each league can decide whether to make changes to this basic scoring system.

There are some leagues that award points to players who rush for 100 yards, receive for 100 yards or pass for 300 yards.

As mentioned above, each team goes head-to-head with another team each

Technology to aid teaching

MIRANDA KENNEDY

▶ Justin 109 is the next in a series of classrooms receiving technological renovations.

Several classrooms are getting technological renovations, and Justin 109 is the next to be completed.

Lee McQueen, associate director of facilities planning, said Justin 109 is projected to be a functioning classroom by Sept. 9.

The renovations include IBM-compatible PCs, Macintosh Power PCs and Elmo presenters.

Elmo is a projector with a camera inside. It takes a picture of what a teacher puts on the surface beneath the camera and sends it to an overhead screen. Elmo is already in use in Umberger 105 and Waters 328.

Similar work in Willard 114 is under way. Cardwell 102 and 103 and the second floor of Eisenhower Hall will get similar equipment on portable carts.

The carts will have almost all the equipment available in the other classrooms. Teachers will be able to use the cart in Eisenhower in nine rooms on the second floor.

Renovations to Justin 109 have been in planning since last September. Work started May 20 and is projected to be finished Sept. 9.

Vice Provost Elizabeth Unger said each classroom's core technology will cost $25,500. The price for each room increases, depending on the room's size and what additional technology it has.

Sharon Morcos, instructor of foods and nutrition, teaches in Umberger 105. She said she likes Elmo because she can put anything on it."No longer are you having to run and make a transparency."

Students can bring in articles about things they are interested in, and she can put it on the Elmo projector so the class can discuss it.

This summer Morcos was discussing garlic's possible lipid-lowering effect, and she said she realized many students may never have seen fresh garlic. She minced some garlic on the Elmo projector and students could watch it in 3-D and in color.

Betsy Bergen, associate professor in the School of Family Studies and Human Services, teaches in Justin 109.

Justin 109 cannot be used because it does not have chairs. The University has the chairs, but the company has not had time to install them. Most of the classes that are supposed to meet there are meeting in the Union Little Theatre.

McQueen said the vendor has committed to installing the chairs Sept. 5, 6 and 7.

Deb Canter, director of the dietetics program, also teaches a class that was supposed to be in Justin 109. Her class is taught to students on campus and to off-campus students via video-conferencing.

McQueen said Justin 109 will have video-conferencing capabilities when the renovations are finished. Two cameras will tape the professor, and one camera will tape the students.

Justin 109 will also get a new sound system similar to the one in Umberger 105. The sound system in Justin 109 hasn't worked for years, Bergen said.

Morcos said Umberger 105's system works well in a large classroom. She can now hear students ask questions from the back row. Two microphones pick up students' questions and send them to an earpiece the teacher wears.

Justin 109 will be able to use new software, including PowerPoint, Astound and Microsoft Office Suite. The computers will also have access to the Internet.

Clinton strategist resigns over sex scandal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — President Clinton's chief political strategist and author of his family-values agenda resigned Thursday in a sex scandal, souring Clinton's shining moment on the final night of the Democratic convention.

The embarrassing exit of Dick Morris tore a gaping hole in Clinton's election team on the eve of the fall campaign and threw the White House into a frenzy of damage-control.

Morris fled home to Connecticut after publication of intimate details of an alleged yearlong affair with a $200-an-hour call girl, Sherry Rowlands.

Morris supposedly invited her to listen in on telephone conversations with the president and showed her copies of convention speeches to be given by Hillary Clinton and Vice President Al Gore.

As the news swept through the convention, Morris left a seven-paragraph resignation statement behind in Chicago. "While I served, I sought to avoid the limelight, because I did not want to become the message," Morris wrote. "Now, I resign so I will not become the issue."

Clinton, who has had a stormy relationship with Morris for nearly two decades, said in a statement that he was thankful for Morris' help in the campaign. "Dick Morris is my friend, and he is a superb political strategist," the statement said.

Republican candidate Bob Dole, vacationing in California, said that without Morris, Clinton likely will "revert to the liberal Democrat he really is." However, spokesman Nelson Warfield said Dole felt "no euphoria" when he learned of Morris' problem.

The story of the "White House Call Girl Scandal" was broken by the Star, the same publication that paid Gennifer Flowers in 1992 for details of her supposed affair with Clinton.

Phil Bunton, the Star's editor, said the tabloid paid Rowlands more than the $12,000 she said she had been paid by Morris during a yearlong relationship.

Bunton said Rowlands, 42, came to the newspaper in mid-July with an offer to sell her story. She had been working for escort services for years and wanted to get out of the business, he said.

The Star quoted from alleged diary entries from Rowlands giving intimate details of the supposed relationship. The Star printed photos of Morris and Rowlands kissing and hugging, and another of them together in bathrobes.

Morris' response: "I will not subject my wife, family or friends to the sadistic vitriol of yellow journalism." He is married to lawyer Eileen McGann, and they live in West Redding, Conn.

Rowlands told the Star that Morris had nicknamed Hillary Rodham Clinton "the twister" for her knack of stirring up trouble. He called the president "the monster" for his hot temper.

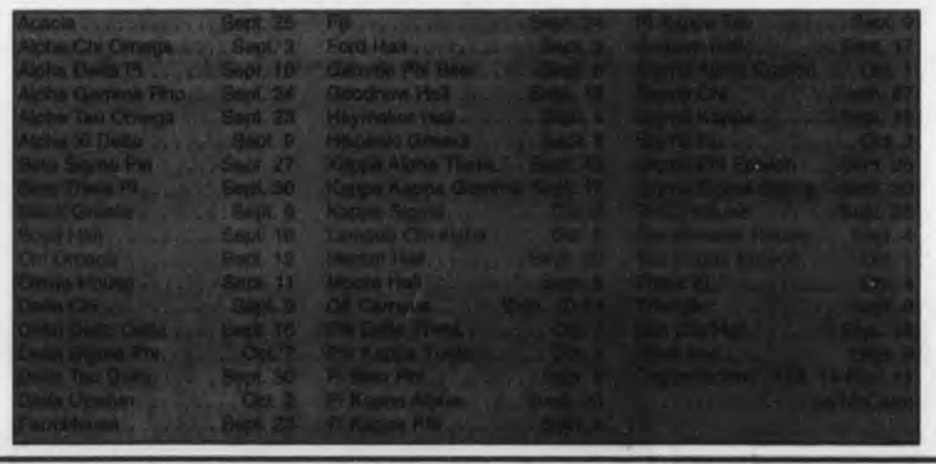
Brash and brilliant, Morris was the architect of Clinton's comeback from the Republican election landslide of 1994. He had many enemies at the White House because of his arrogance and influence over Clinton, and some senior advisers were not sorry to see him go.

One White House official, when asked whether Morris was resigning, smiled and said, "If there is a God ..."

Tipper Gore, wife of Vice President Al Gore, reacted with shock. "Whoa," she said. "Well ... no comment."

Bill Curry, a White House political operative and Morris ally, said he was reluctant to accept the story but said it was "quite devastating for him (Morris) personally. My sympathy goes out to his family."

House Speaker Newt Gingrich's press secretary, Tony Blankley, said, "It's bad news for the president on his biggest day here, coming just two days after they were talking about family values."



And in a political sense, Blankley said, "He's lost his Bonaparte immediately before the campaign begins."

▶ COURT EXPERIENCE

Students fulfill civic duties, serve justice on jury duties

BREE BISNETTE
staff writer

Jury duty may be something with which many K-State students are unfamiliar. Only three K-Staters were on record as having served as jurors in Riley County in the past year.

Some students might have been dismissed by attorneys, but many more didn't serve because of personal conflict.

Scott Benjamin was a philosophy major at K-State in April, when he served on a jury for a trial concerning the battery of a police officer.

He said that often the only exposure people get to juries is through televised trials like O.J. Simpson's, which can be misleading. He said many condemn the legal process before they have had any concrete experience with it.

"The process is slow, but it's that way so that it's fair," Benjamin said.

"There are real people on juries, and in the end, I feel juries do reach the correct verdicts, and justice does prevail. People who haven't been on juries sometimes don't feel that the system works, but it does," he said.

There are a lot of college students who want to be released, said Nancy Rohn, jury coordinator and administrative assistant to judge Jerry Mershon.

Rohn said Riley County understands students pay in advance. She said it's not fair to expect them to miss class, but it is important for students to participate on juries whenever possible.

"Serving on a jury is a great learning experience," Rohn said. "I'm surprised so many students want to get out of it. Students can observe the court procedures, like how the jury is selected, how a case is presented and how the jury deliberates. They can see how the system actually works."

In addition to jury duty's being an educational experience, a jury of one's peers is pertinent to a fair trial, which necessitates the youthful perspective offered by college-age students, Rohn said.

One student said she served on a jury in January that was not diverse in age. Melissa Scarpinato, junior in English, was involved in deciding who was at fault in a traffic accident. She said there were older men and a few older women on her panel.

"I probably could have gotten out of it if I had wanted to," Scarpinato said, "but without me, there wouldn't have been a young point of view."

Rohn said as many different types of people as possible are wanted to contribute their opinions on jury panels in Riley County.

"We want a well-rounded jury, not just people who are unemployed," Rohn said.

"We want people who are unemployed, employed, students, professors, presidents of banks and so forth. You never know when you're going to be a victim of a criminal charge or be hurt or sued, and you would want a well-rounded jury," she said.

If a younger person is on trial, an older juror may find it more difficult to understand the defendant as a result of the age difference, Benjamin said.

"People are supposed to get a trial by their peers, and unfortunately, crimes

GEORGETTE JOHNSON of Manhattan walks home after spending the night with her sister on campus. Johnson, 16, is a junior at Manhattan High School.

Moreau's isle not paradise

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Marlon Brando and Val Kilmer in the same movie.

Sounds interesting, no?

In "The Island of Dr. Moreau," not even a couple of bad-boy, misunderstood actor geniuses can save this seriously misguided effort on the part of director John Frankenheimer.

This film, an adaption of the novel by H.G. Wells, is no comedy, but I was laughing. A lot. By myself. Apparently, no one else in the theater wanted to ante up to the fact that we all overpaid $5 to see this movie. This movie is instant camp, if nothing else.

It will probably come as no surprise that the movie had production problems. Kilmer, quickly becoming the Shannen Doherty of cinema, reportedly was a problem — even prompting Brando to suggest Kilmer's talent wasn't proportional to his salary.

What are the problems within the movie? Do you have half a day on your hands?

First, Brando seemed resigned once again to playing an over-the-top role (remember "Apocalypse Now"?) that seemed to drift off, in and out of consciousness, as if Brando were literally making it up as he went along.

According to "Entertainment Weekly," the scene in which Brando wears an ice bucket to relieve the heat wasn't scripted, but no one had the guts to tell him he couldn't do it. That pretty much sums up the general spirit of the movie.

Brando plays the title role, a somewhat misunderstood, Nobel Prize-winning scientist whose visionary experiments in the cross-breeding of animals and humans has been deemed too controversial for society.

Go figure!

However, as Kilmer politely lets us know: "He invented Velcro." He can't be all bad.

I guess his patents on Velcro are what helped him purchase an island and construct a lush compound á la "Fantasy Island," via "Jurassic Park," in which to conduct his crude experiments.

Kilmer is Moreau's more down-to-earth (which doesn't say much) gopher, Montgomery, who has kidnapped a United Nations lawyer, Douglas (David Thewlis), whose ship has sunk in the South Pacific and taken him to the island.

This island is no vacation in Hawaii. Comprising the majority of the population are the freakish byproducts of Moreau's experiments — a sort of reject cast of a bad touring show of "Cats." The makeup and special effects here just don't work. What are supposed to be menacing jaguars look more like Halloween costumes on the cheap.

So these ramshackle island peasantry are the children of Moreau, who controls them by electronic implants. Well, let's just say a couple of the humanimals rip the devices out and take over, blah, blah, blah — as if it matters at this point.

movie REVIEW

The only really scary aspect of the movie is seeing Brando in a white sheet and white make-up doing his best impersonation of Shelley Winters doing her best impersonation of Jabba the Hut.

Look at the movie on the Web at (http://www.drmoreau.com/index.html).

Keeping within this spirit, Kilmer nails a great impersonation of Brando but otherwise loses all respect for his role and slips into Jim Morrison phase, drugs and all.

This makes this movie all the more a sad spectacle for Thewlis. He plays, on the screen and in reality, the poor, sane person who must fight to stay alive.

You begin to wish he would not only get off the island, but out of the movie. By that time, however, you'll wish to get out of the movie.

Kansas delegates take issue with Dole's record

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — The Kansas Democratic chairman took a rhetorical trip to what he called Bob Dole's Land of Oz in casting the state's 42 votes for President Clinton's renomination.

"Bob Dole left Kansas for Oz more than 35 years ago. Bob Dole has been inside the Washington beltway even before there was a Washington beltway," Dennis Langley said.

Langley, of Hutchinson, blasted Dole's resistance to tobacco regulation: "Like the scarecrow, he has no brains!"

Finding his rhythm, Langley said Dole, as a young congressman, voted against Medicare: "Like the tin man, Bob Dole has no heart!"

In resisting gun-control legislation, Langley said, "Like the cowardly lion, Bob Dole has no political courage."

"Madam Secretary, we Kansans know the truth about Bob Dole, because we've watched his performance behind the bureaucratic curtains of Oz for the past 37 years."

are frequently committed by our age range, but the cases are decided by the older generation," Benjamin said.

In Riley County, residents are randomly chosen for jury duty from driver's licenses and voter registration.

If summoned, the process begins by reporting to the jury assignment office on the third floor of the Riley County Courthouse on the issued day and time, where potential jurors receive instructions on where to go. Riley County pays $10 per day for serving on a jury.

"She loved being able to interact with the administration on issues that came up on a day-to-day basis," she said.

Van De Velde said Wentzel was a solid person to whom she enjoyed talking. She said President Wefald would also miss her.

Unger remembers Wentzel as a true K-State fan.

"She was the greatest Wildcat fan I've known. She always wore purple and white on Fridays to show her loyalty and contributions to this institution," Unger said.

With Wentzel's dedication to K-State, Unger said this made her particularly aware of students.

Wentzel was always described as a professional, but she also took great pride in her family. On Tuesday, just three days after her death, her sixth grandchild was born.

"Each person can be replaced for what they do, but nobody can replace Beatrice for who she was," Unger said.

After an in-house University investigation began last spring, results from that investigation were given to the K-State Police and the Riley County Attorney's office. Now the Kansas Bureau of Investigation is handling an ongoing investigation of the embezzlement.

The Office of Student Activities and Services has adopted a new accountability system this year. The system changes many of the internal office procedures.

Among its changes, it ensures that all signatures will be original, any group receiving funding from the Student Governing Association will have its own University account, and a study of the office network computer system will occur this fall.

TURQUOISE SOL plays in front of a live audience Thursday night. The band played in front of Manhattan Town Center as part of the Purple Power Play on Poyntz festivities.

Turquoise Sol provides writer funky multiple-music mix

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

I couldn't stand still.

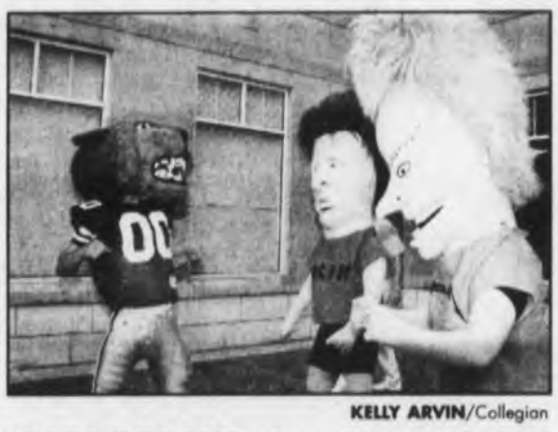
Turquoise Sol had an unusual, interesting sound. The combination of jazz, calypso and funk created something great that kept people moving as the band opened for the Purple Power Play on Poyntz Thursday night.

The brass, consisting of a trumpet and trombone, was truly strong. Bongos and other drums were used to surround the band with a great calypso beat.

Turquoise Sol's music reminded me of the Caribbean. It was upbeat and extremely energetic.

A power problem delayed the band for about an hour, giving time for a crowd to form. At 6 p.m., when the band was scheduled to perform, the crowd was thin. About 100 listeners gave dedicated attention to the band after it had played a while.

Turquoise Sol performed for about 45 minutes. The crowd enjoyed what it heard and had a good time.



A small group followed the band's invitation to dance front and center.

At one point, a few children from the crowd decided to show a few break-dancing moves. Strangely enough, this gave the vocalist a chance to work with the crowd by naming them the "Turquoise Sol break-dancers" from the stage.

Two people dressed as Beavis and Butt-head made an appearance at the Power Play. While milling through the crowd, they found their way to the stage. The duo joined the dancing crowd to do a few steps of its own.

The crowd was sometimes nearly as entertaining as the band.

Check out Turquoise Sol the next time it comes to town.

Purple Power Play provides more musical selections

The Purple Power Play on Poyntz Pep Rally is offering a free concert Friday night for Wildcat football fans.

The rally will feature bands that will perform for free to get the town of Manhattan excited for Saturday's game against Texas Tech.

"It's a way to kick off the season," J.J. Davis, program director for KQLA-FM 103.5, said.

The rally is being sponsored by Q103.5 and includes a free fireworks display between acts.

The free concert begins at 6 p.m. and will include music from Mark Hank Monroe, Derek Shacklett, Anne Zimmerman, Betty-O and Seven.

After the first five bands play, Q103.5 will play music live with "Concert in the Sky" under the free fireworks display.

"Friday's fireworks will be pretty spectacular," Davis said.

The band Airegin will begin playing at 9:45 p.m. and finish up the night's festivities.

"Bring the lawn chairs out to the Manhattan Town Center, tune in to the Q and listen to the concert in the sky," Davis said.

K-State students might not realize just how much K-State football has changed.

"I've been here since the Gibson days, and it's really interesting to see how the community has gotten together to support the team," Jack Larson, Manhattan resident, said.

Larson and his wife returned to Manhattan in June after living in Arizona for nine years, but they called ahead to reserve their season tickets.

"We would've never had to even worry about it before," he said.

Lee Brown, Manhattan resident, has purchased season tickets since 1945. Brown said that at that time, a big parade and preseason celebration were held on Moro Street.

"I may not look like a wild Wildcat," Brown said.

"But it was a long time ago, and I did have my day," he said.

Scott Howard, Manhattan resident, said he has been to games where fans could sit anywhere.

"In fact, a lot of the games had less people than there were at the fan night on Wednesday," he said.

Peering from beneath a large, purple-and-white, Dr. Seuss-style hat, Howard's son, Andrew, said Kevin Lockett was his favorite Wildcat football player because he was fast.

Andrew Howard, a Northview School fourth-grader, bought the hat at Worlds of Fun especially to wear to games.

Popular with younger fans were Brian Kavanagh, quarterback, and Lockett, wide receiver.

"We love Kavanagh," screamed a group of Woodrow Wilson School fifth-graders when asked to name their favorite K-State player.

Kavanagh and Lockett were greeted with loud applause when they stepped forward to speak at the pep rally.

"Kevin Lockett is just awesome," said Bethany Fox, student at Susan B. Anthony Elementary School.

Along with the new Big 12 Conference comes a new Voice of the Wildcats.

Purple Power Play marked the first official appearance of Greg Sharp. Sharp told fans to arrive early at the game.

"When the Red Raiders come into the stadium to warm up, I want them to feel that purple power," Sharp said.

week of the season for 15 weeks. The total points of one team's starters are compared with the total points of its opponent. The team with the most points wins that particular game.

Depending on how big a league is, teams might play against each other two or three times over the course of a season.

Corley said fantasy football provides more than just fun and excitement.

"It's the opportunity to make some bank," Corley said.

For those not familiar with fantasy football lingo, "making some bank" means money is involved in most leagues.

Each owner might put five dollars into a pot before the draft. At the end of the season, the cash could be given to the winner or divided among the top three teams.

It's a simple and easy sport to get involved with, and nobody has to break a sweat.

weeks to adjust to the offense. Rhett posted 11 touchdowns last season with the Bucs. Don't expect any more than five to seven this season.

4. Rodney Hampton. Be leery of Hampton if you are looking for a consistent back during the year. Yes, Hampton did score 10 touchdowns last season for the Giants, but he was also held scoreless in 12 of New York's 16 games.

Plus, Hampton doesn't have the best talent surrounding him in New York. Expect six to eight touchdowns this season.

To wrap this all up, here are my top-10 overall picks: 1. Emmitt Smith, 2. Steve Young, 3. Brett Favre, 4. Jerry Rice, 5. Chris Warren, 6. Curtis Martin, 7. Herman Moore, 8. Marshall Faulk, 9. Carl Pickens, 10. Barry Sanders

Zoo will host jazz festival

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

Get jazzed up this holiday weekend at Sunset Zoological Park.

The seventh annual Cool Cats Jazz Festival , featuring the Woody Herman Orchestra, will be from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday.

Guests can start the day by attending a free clinic on jazz tips and techniques, conducted by the Woody Herman Orchestra. The clinic is sponsored by the International Association of Jazz Educators.

Kicking off the stage performances at noon will be Wasted Potential.

K-State students and members of the Manhattan community might recognize the locally popular group from regular performances at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

Brian Brooks, senior in market ing, has played drums for Wasted Potential for three months.

Brooks said that he did not realize the reputation of the band until events such as the Cool Cats Jazz Festival started coming up.

"A lot of people recognize you, which is strange," he said.

Wasted Potential will have two guest performers. Vocalist Betti O'Jones is a recent talent-competition winner at the Apollo Theatre in New York.

Trombonist Dennis Wilson is the director of jazz studies at K-State and the lead trombonist in the Carnegie Hall Jazz Orchestra in New York.

The Scamps, a group native to Kansas City, will also perform. The band has been together for more than 50 years and has been featured at other festivals, including the Kansas City Jazz Festival.

Bill McFarlin, artistic director for the festival and trumpeter for Wasted Potential, said the average age of the band members was about 75.

The Woody Herman Orchestra will wrap up the stage activity with a performance at 4 p.m.

The legendary big band, developed by Woody Herman in 1936, is now under the direction of Frank Tiberi, a personal choice of Herman's.

The band is nationally acclaimed for its college clinics and has appeared at presidential inaugurations and the Grammy Awards.

McFarlin said, "In my opinion, the Woody Herman Orchestra is the strongest big band performing in the country."

Other activities planned for the day include a dramatics workshop focusing on role-playing, costume make-up and puppet theater, an antique car show, a jazz film extravaganza, cool-cat face-painting and live animal programs.

"Wonder Spots" will be set up around the zoo, where visitors can touch items like an emu egg, the pelt of a lion or a tiger's whisker.

Angie Fenstermacher, marketing and development director at Sunset Zoo, said attendance at the jazz festival has risen in the three years she has worked with it.

"When the festival began, our attendance was 1,000, maybe 1,500 people on that day. Last year, we had around 4,000," she said.

A concert stage was brought in last year to replace the small stage made of risers, allowing the zoo to accommodate a band like the Woody Herman Orchestra, which could have 15 members.

Fenstermacher said about 800 chairs will be available, but seating is on a first-come, first-served basis. Guests are welcome to bring lawn chairs or blankets.

McFarlin and Fenstermacher worked together to organize the talent for the festival.

"We talk about cost and what I think we can cover with grants and donations so that we can still offer the event at $3," said Fenstermacher. "He (McFarlin) comes up with what he thinks will fit nicely in Manhattan, is within our budget and is available."

Festival admission is $3 for adults, $1.50 for children ages 5 to 12, and no charge for those 4 and younger.

The Watering Hole Concession Stand and Little Caesar's Pizza will be open throughout the day at the park.

The Big 12 RUNDOWN

(News & notes from the Conference)

• SENIOR TAILBACK KENYETTA WILLIAMS has returned to practice at Missouri with a promise to put his personal problems behind him.

Williams disappeared on Aug. 18, a day after he told Coach Larry Smith he was unsure about his future on the team. His absence from several practices after that spurred rumors that he had quit.

"I had to get away to collect my thoughts," said Williams after returning from his unexplained absence. "I didn't know all of the hoopla that was going on back here in Columbia until I got back."

• COLORADO QUARTERBACK KAY DETMER was given full medical clearance to play out his senior year, team officials said. Before Monday's official announcement, Detmer had been cleared for all but full-contact action, which — as a quarterback — he would have been kept away from anyway, team officials said.

Meanwhile, Colorado coaches still have not named a starting punter for the Buffaloes, preferring instead to let the competition between Andy Mitchell, sophomore Jeremy Aldrich and freshman Nick Pietsch carry on for a while.

• IN THE FIRST GAME ever to be played by a Big 12 member, Texas A&M earned the distinction of being the first Big 12 member to lose a football game. Unranked Brigham Young University toppled the preseason No. 13 Aggies in a hard-fought 41-37 battle Aug. 24.

The defensive performance by the Aggies was the worst in the 101-year history of the program.

Brandon Stewart passed for 232 yards in addition to the rushing attack's 257 yards. Stewart's fumble late in the fourth quarter ended any hope for an Aggie comeback.

• STARTING CORNERBACK KEVIN WILLIAMS and starting noseguard Jamal Williams were academically ineligible to play this fall.

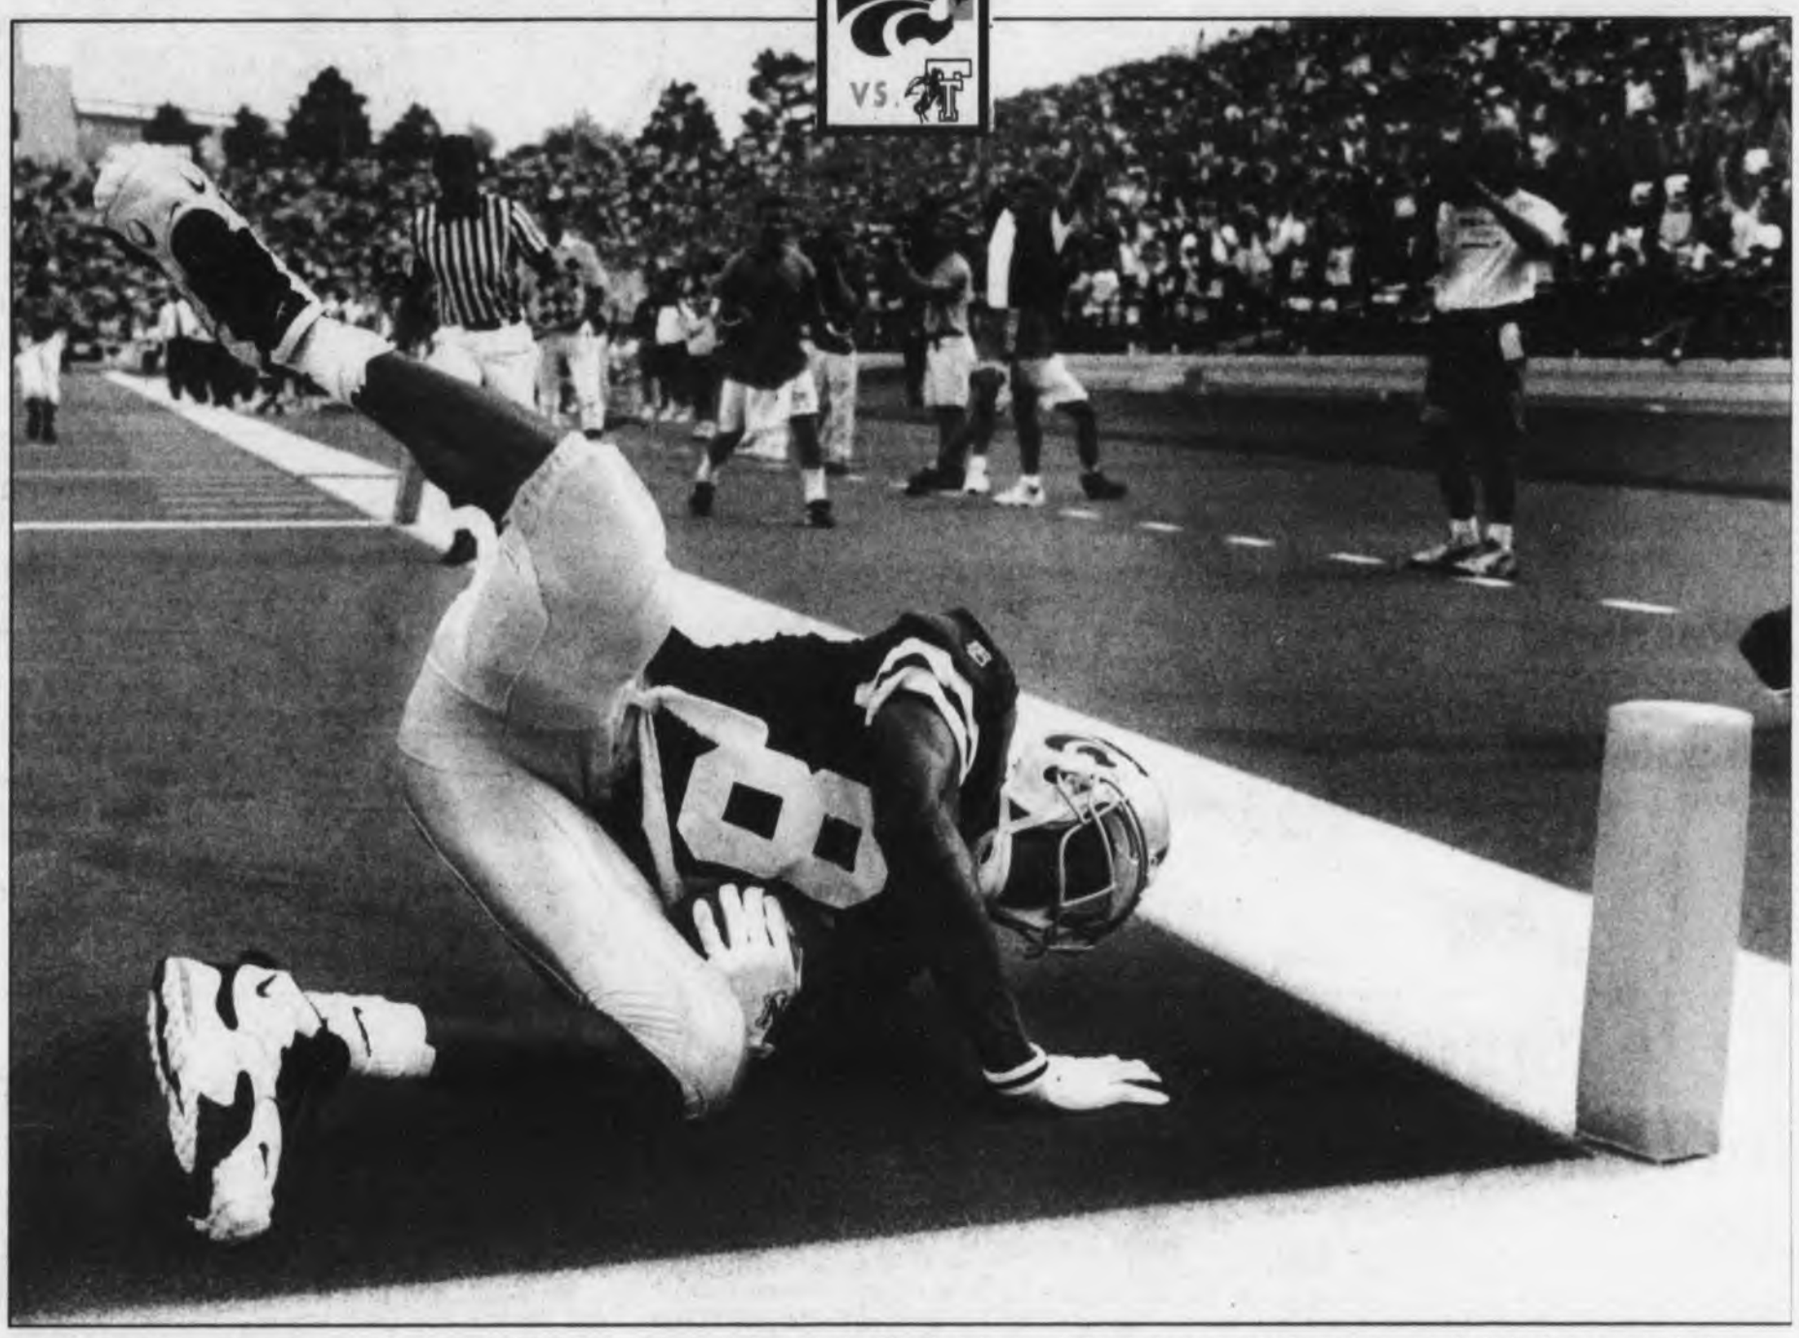
Starting offensive lineman Calvin Menephee, starting wide receiver Tank Coleman and backup offensive lineman Chris Lewis were suspended Tuesday for today's game for breaking team policies.

They join tight end Alonzo Mayes, who was suspended for the first game earlier this year for the same reason, and starting offensive lineman Brian Guillory, who was suspended for the season.

• SENIOR I-BACK DAMON BENNING is fighting with sophomore Ahman Green for the starting position.

"It's open, but you don't discount what happened last year and what happened in spring ball. That all factors in," running-back coach Frank Solich said.

Last year, Green set the freshman rushing record, running for 1,086 yards and scoring 13 touchdowns.



Benning was sidelined with a pulled hamstring and a sprained ankle last season but still rushed for 407 yards, averaging 6.5 yards per attempt. In the spring he was hampered with a pulled calf muscle.

• LARRY SMITH SIGNS CONTRACT. Smith, in the third year of a five-year contract, is 6-16-1 since joining Missouri in December 1993.

"Larry Smith is moving the Tigers football program in the right direction," Castiglione said, "and this contract extension will help ensure the program's future stability and progress."

Smith said, "I'm extremely happy and pleased with the extension. It gives our program a vote of confidence and helps us continue to build a solid foundation for the future."

KEVIN LOCKETT, wide receiver, crashes down in the end zone for a touchdown against Temple in last season's opening game. Lockett is known as the baby-face assassin by his teammates, because his youthful characteristics hide his athleticism.

WILDCATS START BIG 12 SEASON

story by todd stewart • photos by darren whitley

Ten wins and a bowl victory. And still it is not enough.

"Everyone wants to be No. 1," K-State junior cornerback Demetric Denmark said. "I think it's realistic."

And the Wildcats will know exactly where it stands right from the get-go, opening its season today against Texas Tech in the inaugural Big 12 conference game.

"We can see where we are early in the season," senior free safety Mario Smith said. "The tempo is up. Players are upbeat."

ERIC HICKSON, running back, breaks free from the Temple University defense during last season's opening game. Hickson will sit out this season after breaking his leg.

Coach Bill Snyder said he could feel the change in atmosphere.

"I think there's a real sense of anticipation," Snyder said. "People are anxious and excited to get it started and our players are the same way."

Holding back some of that excitement might be the injuries to cornerback Joe Gordon and running back Eric Hickson, but senior quarterback Brian Kavanagh said the team is confident.

"I'm not nervous at all about this season," Kavanagh said. "I just can't wait for Saturday."

Which may not be the same for Texas Tech Coach Spike Dykes, who said despite his team's recent success, he knows his team is in for a rough go-around.

"We had a pretty good year, but we didn't compare to what K-State did last year," Dykes said. "They're a great team."

Snyder said playing a team like Texas Tech to open the season was not the type of scheduling he's been accustomed to, but that his team will have to be ready.

The Wildcats have traditionally opened the season with a non-conference opponent, allowing the team to ease itself into tougher conference action.

This season will be the first time in K-State history the Cats open with a conference opponent.

"It doesn't fit our scheduling philosophy," Snyder said. "But we can't hold anything back."

Snyder was not the only one who disliked the schedule. Dykes said he wasn't a big fan of the scheduling, especially after K-State passed on Texas A&M to open the season and instead opted for Texas Tech.

"I guess we drew the straw," Dykes said.

Snyder said the decision of Texas Tech over Texas A&M boiled down to a home-field advantage.

"The difference is College Station and Manhattan," Snyder said.

"If you're from Manhattan you better choose Manhattan."

He said in no way was he trying to dodge Texas A&M.

"My recollection is Texas Tech beat Texas A&M," Snyder said. "It had nothing to do with playing Texas Tech or Texas A&M."

Either way, two K-State players have caught Dykes' eye.

Dykes said junior all-America cornerback Chris Canty and senior wide receiver Kevin Lockett might be two of the best players he had seen.

"I don't know if we'll see two better players," Dykes said. "Canty is as good a corner I've seen in I don't know when. Kevin Lockett is the best wide receiver we've faced in several years."

Lockett, however, has motivation other than beating Texas Tech that he will use in Saturday's big game.

The last time the Cats took the field at KSU Stadium, Colorado pulled out a 27-17 heartbreaking win, dashing K-State's Cotton Bowl hopes.

Lockett said he is using that game as motivation for Texas Tech.

"It sticks with me all the time," Lockett said. "We should have a little motivation to win. No one likes to lose at home."

Shuttle service bypasses traffic, construction

TODD STEWART
staff writer

With a sold-out KSU Stadium on gameday, fans have options for tackling the traffic.

Two shuttle buses, free to the public, allow easier access to football games.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, is in charge of one of the shuttle services.

"Last year, it was really big," Sieben said. "This year, we expect it to be even bigger."

Sieben said the Aggieville Business Association began the free shuttle service to get people to shop in Aggieville and offer them a free parking alternative.

"It's a good way to get people down here," Sieben said. "We encourage people to park in City Park or park on campus and walk down here to the shuttle."

The Aggieville shuttle service offers two buses making four trips to the stadium each, with four stops on each trip.

Alan Parker, Westloop Merchants Association president, said that for the third year his group is offering a shuttle.

The Westloop shuttle starts 1-1/2 hours before each game in the Westloop parking lot and runs continuously between Westloop and the stadium until 20 minutes before the game. Forty to 46 fans can be taken to the stadium on each trip.

"A couple of years ago we just started it for the customers," Parker said. "It doesn't cost anything."

Football fans ride free

In addition to free parking in City Park and the K-State campus, two shuttles will provide free transportation to home football games this season.

Rule changes alter football season play

TODD STOVER
staff writer

NCAA Division I-A football will see a few changes in the rulebook this year.

Leading that list of rule changes is a tie-breaking system that will be introduced into all games this season.

Each team will be given a 1st-and-10 at the 25-yard line and the winner will be the first team to score a touchdown for itself, while stopping the other team from doing the same.

Greg Summers, NCAA staff liaison to the football rules committee, said coaches have long wanted to find a solution to tie ballgames.

"In our past surveys, more coaches wanted to break ties than didn't," he said. "Just those who wanted to break ties were split on how to do it."

Summers said some coaches favored an NFL-type overtime system, but more recently, coaches have chosen the 1st-and-10 at the 25.

The tie-breaker had been in the NCAA rulebook since 1973, Summers said, but was only for use in games determining advancement in tournaments or in championship games.

There are also a few more changes to the rule book, one being a clarification in the intentional grounding rule.

A receiver must now have a reasonable chance to catch the ball, instead of just being in the area.

"Basically what this does is eliminate the pass at the sideline, 30 yards over the receiver," Summers said.

This season, the ball will also be ruled dead if a runner's helmet is knocked off, instead of allowing the play to finish on its own.

On special teams, a long snapper cannot be directly run into for one second after the snap. This gives give him a chance to be set for the on-coming rush and eliminate dangerous blows while his head is down.

The last new rule is a penalty for players with illegal cleats.

If a player is found with spikes longer than the allowed 2 inches, he will be suspended for the rest of the game and the entire next game.

"Basically, we've found that longer spikes create a huge advantage," Summers said. "If they're wearing them, we have to find them before it's too late and the game's decided."

Big 12 Conference builds powerhouse tradition

JOHN BERGOREN
staff writer

Expectations are high that the Big 12 Conference will be known through time for developing a tradition as one of the strongest conferences ever.

But before the Big 12 even began, many of the schools already had rich football traditions.

Texas Tech

The Red Raiders have a tradition of ringing a bell carried on a trailer at all its home and away games.

The bell was given to the school from the Santa Fe Railroad and is used as a spirit-raiser.

They call ringing the bell "bangin' Bertha."

Baylor

They call themselves the Bears. Baylor is the smallest university in the Big 12, with only 12,000 students enrolled.

The school colors are green and gold, chosen initially from a view of spring dandelions and green flowers.

Texas A&M

Also known as the Aggies, A&M has a proven way to get its fans involved in games. The school selects student yell leaders who are voted on by the student body.

Five students — three seniors and two juniors — are selected to attend every game clad in white clothing. They lead the crowd, or "the 12th man," in fight cheers.

After every touchdown, Aggie men are supposed to kiss girls standing near them. This is a tradition that dates back to the early years of Aggie football.

The Aggies' mascot is a full-bred American collie named Reveille.

Texas

The Longhorns make their home at the biggest stadium in the Big 12.

Texas' mascot is named Bevo XIII, and its team colors are burnt orange and white.

Nebraska

Possibly the most famous mascot in the Big 12 is Nebraska's Herbie Husker. The Huskers have sold out 208 consecutive home games.

Nebraska has a tradition of running out of a tunnel lined up as a team before each game. The team is usually led by Coach Tom Osborne, who boasts the title of being the winningest coach in college football.

Kansas

The Jayhawks have a tradition known as "waving the wheat." Fans wave wheat in the stands after every Jayhawk scoring drive.

Colorado

The Buffaloes are led onto the field at games by an 11-year-old, 1,300-pound buffalo named Ralphie III.

Lawrence becomes running man

Dan Lewerenz
staff writer

Two years ago, Mike Lawrence was a seldom-used freshman running back. He carried only 12 times for 79 yards behind J.J. Smith and Leon Edwards. Lawrence spent most of his minutes on the Wildcat special teams, thinking of the day when he might be the No. 1 option.

Now Lawrence, a junior, is K-State's No. 1 running back — and he's not sure that's where he wants to be.

An injury to junior Eric Hickson, with whom Lawrence shared the backfield last season, has left Lawrence as the Cats' most experienced rusher heading into the season.

And although Hickson's injury catapulted Lawrence to the top spot, being No. 1 was the furthest thing from his mind.

"I was thinking, 'What of my good friend that just went down?' " Lawrence said.

Lawrence accumulated 599 yards on 143 carries last season, including a career-best 118 yards against Kansas.

Coach Bill Snyder said Lawrence and sophomore Marlon Charles will share time carrying the ball this season.

"I think both of them will play extensively in the ball game," Snyder said. "And like last year, it will be whoever has the hot hand."

But Lawrence said his attitude has not changed.

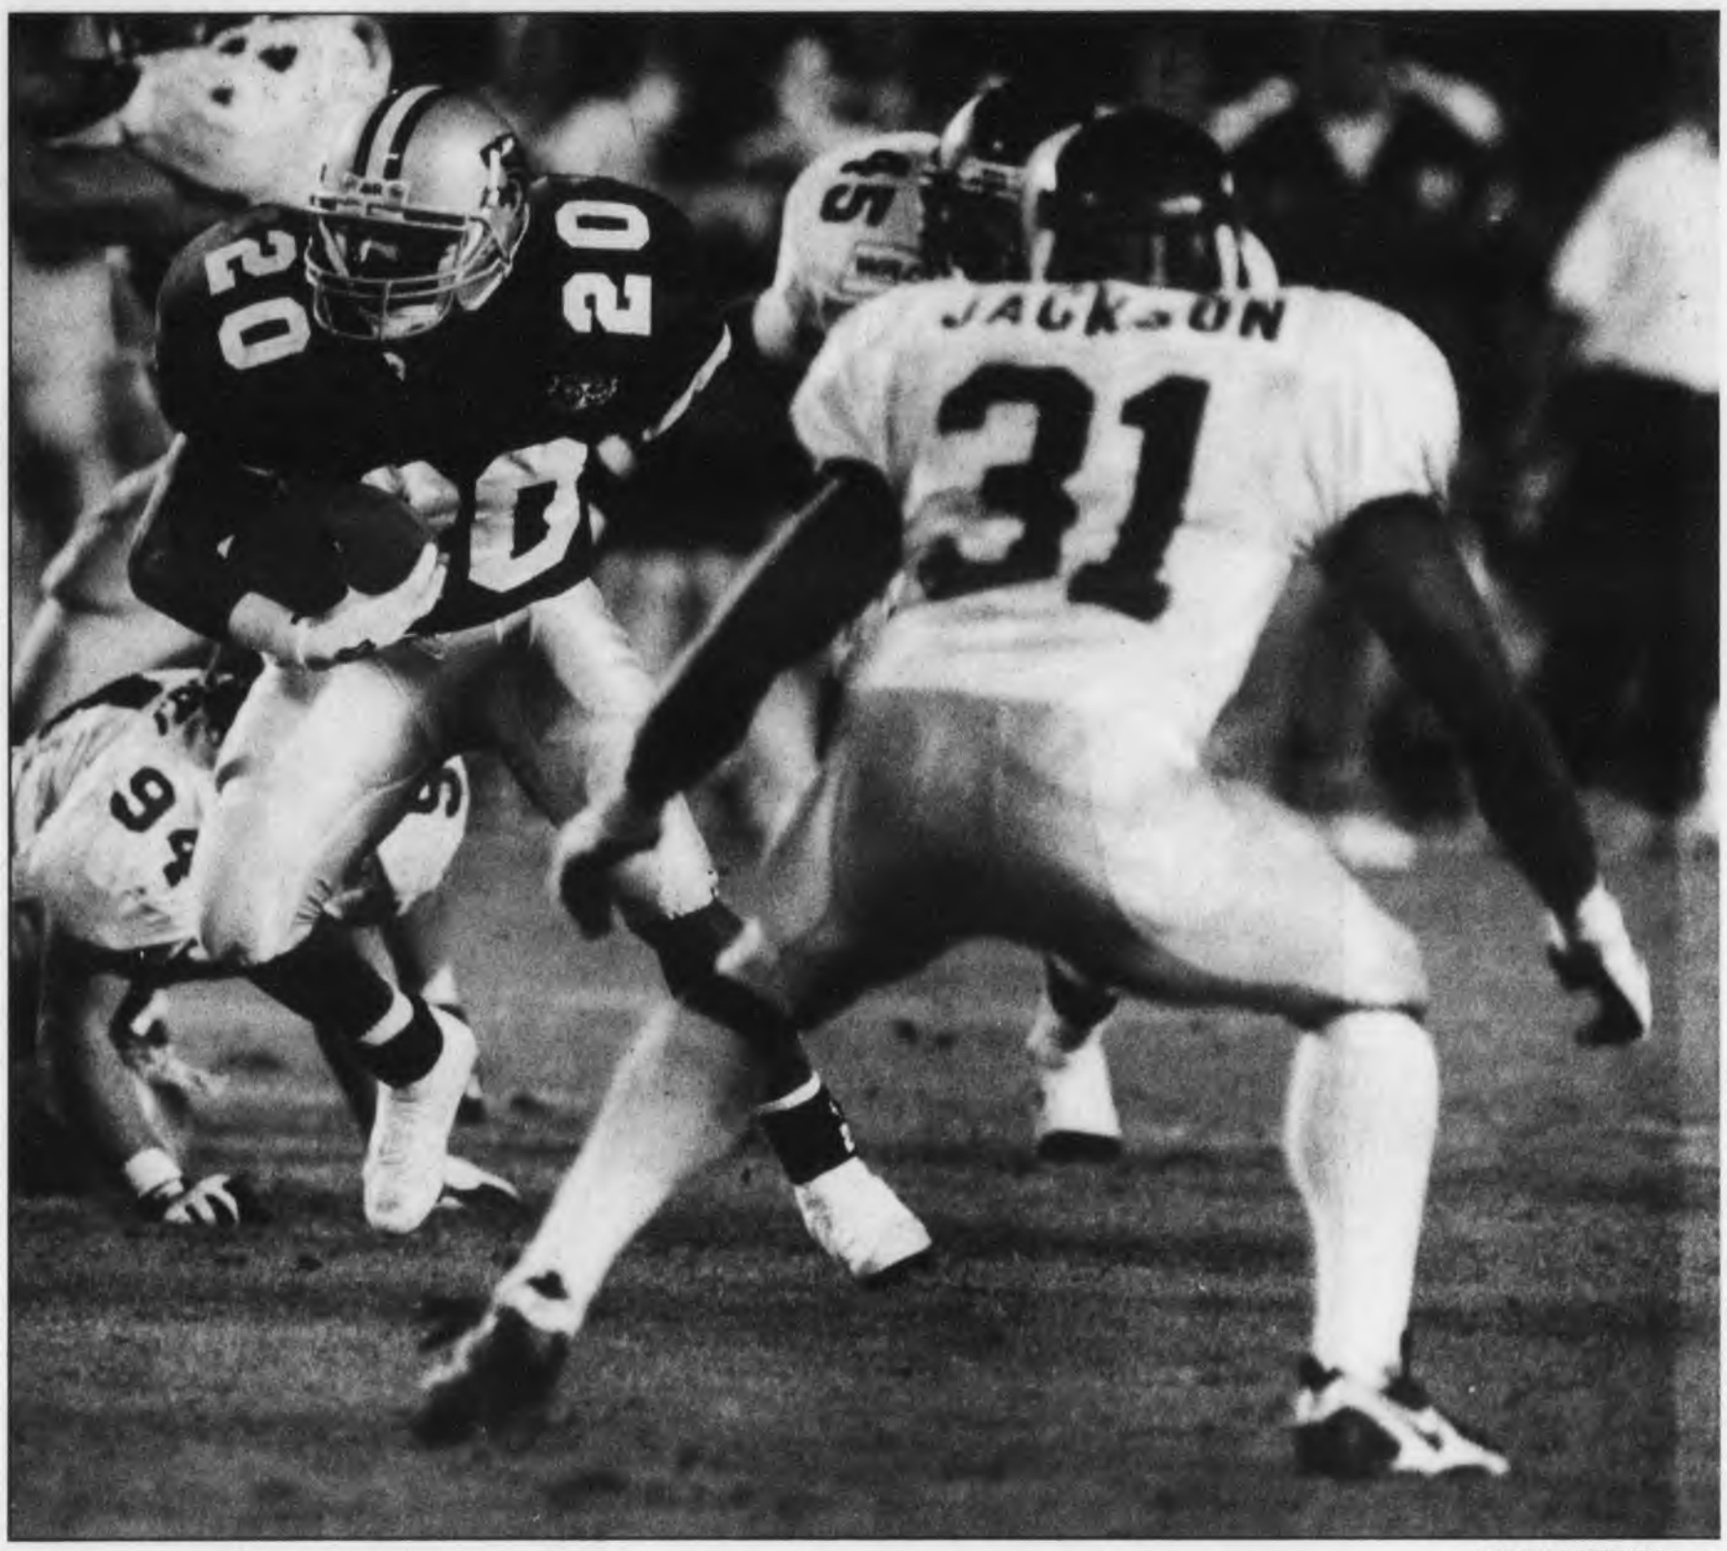
"Whether it was me and Eric, or me and Marlon, I just feel I need to get the job done," he said. "It didn't matter who had the ball. We just want to win."

And Lawrence said he now carries Hickson with him every time he touches the ball.

"I'm just going in like before Eric got hurt," Lawrence said.

"I'm playing for the both of us now. He's going to be in my heart every step of the way."

Lawrence's stats



The second leading rusher of 1995, Mike Lawrence is expected to replace Eric Hickson in Saturday's game against Texas Tech.

MIKE LAWRENCE breaks though the Colorado State University defense during the Holiday Bowl at Jack Murphy Stadium in San Diego. The Cats beat Colorado State 54-21.

Injuries plague Wildcat team, results in altered line-ups

Todd Stewart
staff writer

Just days before fall practice began, Coach Bill Snyder got the break he was not looking for.

Literally.

And then it was déjà vu all over again.

First, it was cornerback Joe Gordon, a two-time, first-team, all-Big 8 selection, who suffered a broken left leg in an informal passing drill. Gordon is not expected to return to the field until Oct. 5, when the Wildcats meet Nebraska at KSU Stadium.

Then, Aug. 21, lightning struck yet again.

Junior running back Eric Hickson broke two bones in his lower left leg during a scrimmage for Fan Appreciation Day.

Hickson is out for the season.

The leading rusher for the Wildcats last year, Hickson set a school record by averaging 5.2 yards per carry while sharing time with junior Mike Lawrence.

Hickson rushed for 816 yards last season, including a season-high 144 yards at Iowa State.

Just days before his injury, however, Hickson said he had loftier goals for this season.

"I want to get 1,000 yards," Hickson said. "Last year, I fell just short, and this year I want to get it."

With that opportunity blown, the job is up to Hickson's replacements, Lawrence and sophomore Marlon Charles.

They combined for 723 yards on the ground last year.

Snyder said the two will split time, but the bulk of the running load will go to whomever is running well on that day.

"Both of them will play extensively in the ball game," Snyder said. "It's kind of just who gets the hot hand."

Even though Gordon is expected back mid-season, the loss will still put a burden on the defensive backfield.

"It's a big loss," senior free safety Mario Smith said. "Younger players are going to have to step up."

Helping with the adjustment in the defensive backfield will be the veteran leadership of junior Chris Canty, a consensus first-team all-American last season, and Smith.

Smith is coming off Holiday Bowl defensive MVP honors.

Snyder has listed freshman Lamar Chapman and junior Demetric Denmark as Gordon's likely replacement.

"We could go with either one of them," Snyder said. "I think the situation will dictate who we go with."

Snyder also said senior Clyde Johnson and junior Monty Spiller could spell time at cornerback.

"We probably have six young guys that can step in and play," Snyder said.

Denmark said not one player can make up for Gordon's loss by himself.

"It's different without Gordon," Denmark said. "Everyone's got to step it up a notch."

Snyder: All-star game participation should be team players' decision

Shana Newell
staff writer

Only weeks before football camp begins, many freshman recruits participate in state all-star games. For some programs, such as Nebraska, participation is not encouraged to prevent injuries that could hurt the program.

At K-State, Coach Bill Snyder said he disagrees with that mindset. Snyder said he insists the choice should be the player's, not the program's.

"It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," he said. "They (the players) only have one chance to be a senior in high school. They have only one chance to be selected for and play in an all-star game at the high-school level. I certainly wouldn't want to take that away from them."

But still, the possibilities for injury exist. A player who chooses to play in an all-star game dances a dangerous waltz with fate.

Incoming Wildcat Shad Meier, a tight end from Pittsburg, danced that waltz. Unfortunately for K-State, the dance ended early.

Meier left the Kansas Shrine Bowl midway through the game with a torn ligament in his left knee. But the experience was worth it, Meier said.

"I wanted to play. The game was for charity, and charity is money for those Shrine Kids," he said.

Wanting to play is one thing, but playing for charity is another, and Meier said the reality of the purpose of the game did not hit home for him until the week before the game.

The Kansas Shriners sent all the all-star players to St. Louis to visit the Shriners Hospital.

"You see those kids and how they live their lifestyle, and you realize you can help them," Meier said. "The Shrine game meant a lot more then."

One boy stuck most in Meier's mind, he said.

David, a youth around Shad's age, was at the Shriners Hospital because he had a knee injury.

"Looking back, I feel really bad for him," Meier said. "He tore all the ligaments in both of his knees, and I only tore one ligament in one knee."

Meier was expected to redshirt this season, so his injury does not hurt K-State's program. Even if it did, Snyder said he would still not prohibit his players from participating in all-star games.

"It was an unfortunate incident that took place," Snyder said.

"I feel badly for Shad. I think everything will be fine. But it (the injury) hasn't altered my view. I would feel uncomfortable taking that option away from him."

It is the option to do something once in a lifetime — to play in a high-school, all-star game and help those less fortunate than oneself.

Cats pound Colorado State in Holiday Bowl match-up

The 1995 football season had come down to one game.

K-State had steadily risen in the polls, falling briefly after stumbling at Nebraska, then rising with successive victories over nationally ranked Kansas and Oklahoma.

But a home loss to Colorado prevented the Wildcats from earning a Cotton Bowl invitation, sending them westward for a match-up with Western Athletic Conference champion Colorado State in the Holiday Bowl.

The teams were supposed to be similar; both sported stingy defenses led by an all-American in the backfield.

But thousands of K-State fans saw otherwise as the Cats crushed the Rams 54-21 on that warm December night in San Diego.

Running back Eric Hickson was the first to draw blood, carrying five of the Cats' seven plays and giving them a 7-0 lead.

The Rams, fed by 35 penalty yards against K-State, evened the score at 7-7, where it would stay at the end of the first quarter.

The second quarter saw the emergence of Brian Kavanagh as a primetime quarterback. Starter Matt Miller, a senior playing in his final game, was leveled by the Rams' linebacker Nate Kvamme.

"The first thing I thought when he got hit was 'I hope he gets up," junior quarterback Brian Kavanagh said. "Then when he didn't get up, I thought, 'I'll be OK for the next series.' And then when they brought the stretcher in, I was just worried about him."

Taken to an area hospital, Miller would be OK — and so would the K-State offense.

Running back Mike Lawrence scored on Kavanagh's first full possession, set up by an interception by free safety Mario Smith, to give the Wildcats a 13-7 lead.

Then it got ugly.

Fullback Dederick Kelly blasted through the Rams' defense on the ensuing possession, with senior tight end Brian Lojka catching a touchdown pass on the next possession.

The score was K-State 26, Colorado State 7.

Fans need to follow tailgating policies

DAN LEWERENZ
staff writer

Are you ready to tailgate?

Make a list, bring your family and friends, bring your bratwurst, bring some coals to cook over, bring a well-stocked cooler, and don't forget your issue of Purple Pride.

But leave the alcohol at home.

Kansas law prohibits the consumption of alcohol on state property except in designated areas.

And, for the second consecutive year, K-State Police will be enforcing that policy.

"It's something that's been law forever," Captain Bob Mellgren said.

"It's just recently that the attorney general has said, 'We will enforce this policy,' " he said.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum, said the change in policy enforcement has not had an effect on pregame spirit.

"I don't think there's been a dampening of spirits at all," Thomas said.

> People still love to show up early and tailgate before the game. They're as spirited as ever.

"People still love to show up early and tailgate before the game. They're as spirited as ever.

"I think the difference is people are a lot smarter about it than maybe they used to be."

Although alcohol and tailgating sometimes seem to be a natural combination, Mellgren said fans have complied with the policy without much dissent.

"People have accepted it pretty well," he said. "A few have complained, but we really haven't had any problems."

Special Olympics starts partnership with Big 12

BRENT STOVER
staff writer

The start of the Big 12 Conference in 1996 also marks the beginning of a partnership between the new conference and the Special Olympics.

The Special Olympics became the official charity of the Big 12.

"It came about last spring at the inaugural Big 12 meetings," said Julie Dorn, assistant director of championships for the Big 12 Conference.

The partnership is still in its early stages, but it is already showing signs of success for both parties involved.

The theme for Special Olympics is "Training for Life." As student-athletes in college train in life skills, so too do Special Olympians who learn the skills they need to become self-sufficient in their everyday lives.

"It's a perfect fit all-around in the long run," Dorn said.

Events are planned for Big 12 athletes to speak to Special Olympians as well as work with them on their athletic skills.

Athletes from the Special Olympics had the opportunity to participate in each of the Big 12 Football Media Days.

The Special Olympics is hoping to get involved with different clinics and presentations at the Big 12 Championships in each of the different collegiate sports.

Special Olympians take part in 22 sports, such as basketball, swimming and soccer.

> The long-range goal is to get athletes of all the different sports involved, as far as volunteering.
> • JULIE DORN
> ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF CHAMPIONSHIPS

Although sports are fun and exciting for Special Olympians, they are also sometimes difficult because of mental and physical handicaps. Many of these Olympians hold collegiate athletes in high regard.

"A lot of these Special Olympians really look up to the college athletes," Dorn said. "The long-range goal is to get athletes of all of the different sports involved, as far as volunteering."

At Colorado, the partnership is already off and running. Football coach Rick Neuheisel serves on the board of directors for the Special Olympics.

With the Big 12 era just beginning, it can already be seen that there is more to this conference, and to life, than sports.

Wildcat athletic department receives NCAA certification

COLLEGIAN STAFF

K-State's athletic programs have been certified by the NCAA Committee on Athletics Certification.

A designation of certified means that K-State has shown it operates its athletic programs in substantial conformity with operating principles adopted by Division I members of the NCAA.

The certification process examined the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' academic and fiscal integrity, governance and commitment to rules compliance, and commitment to equity.

"We are extremely proud to be among those NCAA Division I athletic programs who have earned this accreditation," Jon Wefald, K-State president, said.

Departments can be recognized as certified, certified with conditions or not certified.

"We've practiced close to 100 hours now, and we're ready to play somebody on the other side." – Jim Moore, volleyball coach

Volleyball set to start season

JOHN BERGGREN
staff writer

The volleyball team opens its season this weekend in Evanston, Ill., at the Holiday Inn Wildcat Invitational Tournament.

Coach Jim Moore said his team is ready to take step one in matching or bettering last year's 21-12 performance.

"We've practiced close to 100 hours now, and we're ready to play somebody on the other side," Moore said. "We'll know come Sunday how ready we actually are, but now we really just want to play somebody."

The Cats were slated to play Southwest Missouri State and Northwestern University yesterday. Today, K-State will conclude the tournament against Rice and North Carolina State.

Of the four teams, Rice is the only squad K-State saw last year. The Wildcats swept the Owls in two meetings, 3-1 and 3-1.

K-State finished last season with the best record among the tournament's teams. Rice finished 1995 at 21-17, North Carolina State at 20-15, Southwest Missouri State at 16-12 and Northwestern at 5-25.

Moore said he didn't know much about the four teams his team will play.

"We played Rice last year, but they lost their top player," Moore said. "It's not important how good the other teams are. It's important that we get better each game and know what we need to improve on.

"Now we're in a feeling-out process," Moore said. "We want to see how we react to stress and how we react to pressure."

Moore said how his team deals with the stresses and pressures was going to be important.

"At this level, the emotional and mental aspects of the game are the most important parts of the game," Moore said. "We've tried to put the girls in some stressful situations in practice, but the games will be the real test."

The Wildcats travel to Rice next weekend for a second four-team tournament.

K-State begins its first homestand Sept. 13 and 14 when they play host to the KSU Invitational at Ahearn Field House. Visiting teams University of Missouri-Kansas City, South Carolina, Eastern Michigan and Boise State will compete in the tournament.

COACH JIM MOORE questions a play during volleyball practice Wednesday at Ahearn Field House.

"Talk about taking the pressure off me," Kavanagh said. "The game is tied, and Mario picks off a pass and gives us the ball inside the 30. A couple plays later, we score. The next series, we block a punt, and we get the same field position. I had been in the game four snaps, and we had two touchdowns."

Kavanagh would follow up with touchdown passes to wide receivers Kevin Lockett and seniors Tyson Schwieger and Mitch Running, earning him Offensive Most Valuable Player honors.

"We have this confidence in Kavanagh that he can come and step in," Schwieger said. "There was no nervousness at all. You could see the confidence in his eyes."

Smith, who snared another Colorado State pass for his first two-interception outing, was named the Defensive MVP.

Oklahoma State

Known as Pistol Pete, the Cowboys' mascot leads its fans by provoking mischief and starting cheers among its fans.

It is also common at Oklahoma State to find tailgate parties with live music and trolleys that ferry fans from downtown areas to the stadium during home games at the Cowboys' Lewis Field.

Iowa

The school's athletes are called the Cyclones. The name was given to the school in the summer and early fall of 1895, when a large number of tornadoes wreaked havoc on the state of Iowa. At that time, tornadoes were more commonly called cyclones.

The Cyclones' mascot, however, is a cardinal displaying the school colors, cardinal and gold.

Although the Big 12 has not completed its first month of football existence, plenty of tradition already exists.

Iraq two-stepping south

SPEED

- Iraqi troops retreated from the U.S.-protected Kurdish safe haven in northern Iraq, but a White House source said they aren't significantly withdrawn.

▪ European oil prices rise as U.N. suspends Iraq's oil trade.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALAH AD-DIN, Iraq — As Iraqi troops pulled back from the northern Kurdish city of Irbil on Monday, refugees who had fled to a nearby town described the biggest offensive by Saddam Hussein's army since the Persian Gulf War.

"It was very frightening. Boom here, boom there. Taka-taka-taka. We were scared to death," said Sabira Hamid Hursid, who fled with her four children to Salah ad-Din, 20 miles northeast of Irbil.

Iraqi troops did not allow reporters to approach Irbil, where they were pulling out on Monday, leaving their Kurdish allies in control.

But U.N. workers there told the Associated Press that there were still Iraqi tanks in fields three to six miles outside the city. A Clinton administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the withdrawal was not significant.

White House press secretary Mike McCurry said Saddam must not go unchallenged. The 20,000 U.S. troops in the Persian Gulf region were on high alert, and Gen. John Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, traveled to Saudi Arabia and Jordan. Saudi Arabia agreed to cooperate in any U.S. retaliatory action, Saudi sources said on condition of anonymity.

The offensive also prompted the United Nations to delay its plan to let Iraq resume limited oil sales despite sanctions. On Monday, oil prices in Europe jumped sharply on the news; U.S. markets were closed for Labor Day.

Saddam's troops stormed Irbil, the main city in the U.S.-protected Kurdish safe haven in northern Iraq, on Saturday. The Kurdistan Democratic Party had asked Iraq for help in dislodging the rival Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

Aggieville tests employee discounts

MAX SPURGIN
staff reporter

Employees of many Aggieville businesses are now able to save money simply by shopping at other Aggieville businesses.

The Aggieville Business Association has recently issued advantage cards that allow employees to receive discounts when they shop at other Aggieville businesses.

Cheryl Sieben of the Aggieville Business Association said the card is an added bonus for employees and also supports the member Aggieville businesses.

"The idea was to give a bonus to the employees and to encourage shopping in Aggieville," Sieben said.

Employees of Aggieville businesses can get a card after they have been employed for 30 days. The cards may be used at any of the businesses offering discounts.

Cardholders are required to show identification along with their card to prevent misuse. Cards are only available to members of the business association. Managers are responsible for collecting cards from employees when their employment is terminated.

> "I think as more people start using their card, they will remind the person at that store 'I've got one of those cards maybe I should be more conscious of where I shop and use my card, too.'"
> • CHERYL SIEBEN
> AGGIEVILLE BUSINESS ASSOCIATION

The discounts are not valid with other discounts employees receive.

"One merchant told me that their employees get a discount while they are working, but if they come in when they are not working they use their card," Sieben said.

Cards were issued about two weeks ago. They are on a trial basis until Oct. 31.

Sieben said at that time the business association will re-evaluate the cards and make plans to issue discount cards on a permanent basis.

The amount of the discount, if any, is up to the individual businesses.

"They all decide what advantage it would be for them. They make the decision what would be good for their store because they are all different," Sieben said.

"I've had a few people use them," Jeff Harbell, Lucky BrewGrille employee, said, "not a lot, but I've seen them. They aren't using them to buy liquor. You can't discount liquor."

For example, Ballard's Sporting Goods offers 10 percent off regularly priced items, while Krystallos offers 10 percent off its jewelry only. Other businesses, such as Pizza Hut, offer a set dollar amount off certain sizes of pizza.

Alison Melton, senior in speech pathology and Palace Cards & Gifts employee, said she has not used her card yet but has seen some people use them at the Palace. She said the Palace is keeping track of the number of people using the card.

Three different acts had their chance to provoke some finger-snapping, foot-tapping jazz at the Sunset Zoological Park's seventh annual Cool Cats Jazz Festival Monday.

The bill featured Manhattan's own Wasted Potential and the Scamps, a quintet from the rich Kansas City jazz scene. The Woody Herman Orchestra headlined the event. The day's activities also included an antique car show, a jazz clinic for aspiring musicians given by the Woody Herman Orchestra and a film show focusing on the history of jazz.

Many K-State students attended the session given by the Woody Herman Orchestra, which gave musical tips and insights at 10 a.m. on the main stage. After the lessons ended, the majority of the students seemed to vanish, and the festival became a family affair.

When the Woody Herman Orchestra took the stage to perform four hours later, only a sparse number of students were still in attendance. With the lure of wild animals, classic cars, great jazz and $3 tickets as a backdrop to a mild September day, one would expect students to be present.

Wasted Potential was the first act to perform on the main stage. Its vocalist, Betti'O Jones, warned the crowd that she could be a bit racy at times. Jones proceeded to play the crowd like Bobby Fisher plays a game of chess. She owned them.

With a guest appearance by K-State jazz instructor Dennis Wilson, the sextet had the crowd grooving in the early-afternoon sun. When it closed with "Fever," the small crowd on hand gave them a loud cheer.

Situated between the acts was the jazz film extravaganza. The film show was nothing more than a 24-inch television with bad audio, old beat-up footage and an excuse for people to sit in air-conditioning.

As the afternoon started to heat up, so did the jazz.

The Scamps were next to assume control of the stage. With more people in attendance, drummer and vocalist Rusty Tucker unleashed a rapid-fire drum solo to start the set, which got the crowd immediately aroused.

The Scamps' act had a touch of blues influence in their music. The quintet let the audience know where it was from by playing "Kansas City," with Tucker leading the Lake claims family; cause baffles authorities

- Seven people drowned over the weekend in the same lake Susan Smith drowned her two sons in 1994. Foul play is not expected, but the cause is being investigated.

UNION, S.C. — Tears welled in Tommy Vinson's eyes as he talked about John D. Long Lake, where Susan Smith drowned her two little boys in 1994, and seven people drowned over the weekend.

"It's like it's haunted or something," said Vinson, who knew one of the latest victims. "It keeps taking lives."

This small textile town is again dealing with tragedy. Three adults and four children drowned Saturday night when their vehicle rolled into the lake. Five of the victims were from one family, a couple and their three children.

> • TOMMY VINSON
> FRESHMAN IN AGRIBUSINESS

Foul play was not suspected, but autopsies were expected to be conducted today, Union County sheriff Howard Wells said Sunday.

A group of 10 had driven out to the lake and parked next to the boat ramp where Smith killed her children. Their Chevrolet Suburban's headlights were shining on two memorials to the Smith boys, 3-year-old Michael and 14-month-old Alex.

Shortly after five members of the group got out to look at the memorials, the vehicle started to roll, Wells said.

It passed between the memorial markers and knocked over a young tree planted in the Smith boys' memory as it slid down a steep grassy embankment into about 20 feet of water.

Two adults, including the mother of three of the children, dived into the lake to help. They drowned along with everyone in the vehicle. The father of the children was behind the wheel, and the gear shift was found in park, Wells said.

There were no skid marks or tire tracks to indicate the driver did anything to keep the vehicle from going into the water, Wells said.

"We have no indication of what could have caused this," said Wells, who spoke at a news conference in the same spot where he announced nearly two years ago that Smith had confessed to drowning her boys.

The accident killed an entire family from Union: Tim Phillips, 26; his wife, Angela, 22; Courtney, 4; Meleana, 1, and 4-month-old Kinsleigh, Wells said.

Also killed were Carl White, 29, of Campobello and 3-year-

Successful dean to step down

BRANDI HERTIG
staff writer

Jack Henry, dean of K-State-Salina, has announced his resignation, which will take place at the end of the 1996-97 school year.

In his four years as dean, Henry has been in the front of the merger between former Kansas Technical College (now K-State-Salina) and K-State.

Henry said the faculty and staff at Salina, as well as supporters of the University, are the people who have made the merger run smoothly.

"I'm just the guy out front who seems to get all the attention," he said.

> "K-State is one of the best models of student services. It shows that the student is the center.
> • JACK HENRY
> DEAN OF K-STATE-SALINA

The end of the 1996-97 school year will signal a winding-down of the first phase of the merger between the two schools. Henry cites this as one of the reasons for his resignation.

The school has undergone several positive changes, and he has had to handle a lot of difficult and pleasant situations, Henry said.

"It just seems like a good time to do it," he said.

Henry plans to teach at K-State-Salina or do applied research in Salina after his resignation.

Henry said enrollment is up 50 percent at K-State-Salina since he took over as dean in 1991. There is also now a 93- to 94-percent placement rate of graduates in their fields.

In addition, the Salina campus now offers four bachelor of science degrees in technology: mechanical engineering technology, electrical engineering technology, aeronautical technology and technology management. Several new buildings have been added to the campus as well.

It looks and feels more like a traditional campus, Henry said.

The second phase of the merger will involve a continuation of the process of communication between K-State-Salina and K-State.

Roger Steinbrock, public and alumni relations/admissions coordinator for K-State-Salina, said though the campus is still non-traditional, there are more traditional students enrolling at Salina since the merger. Steinbrock said K-State played an inspiring role for the Salina campus.

"K-State is one of the best models of student services," he said. "It shows that the student is the center."

The process to select a new dean is a lengthy process involving composing a search committee including students, staff and people from the community. It is expected to begin in a few weeks, Henry said.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

The Collegian is looking for a few good opinions

We are constantly being bombarded with phone calls and letters from people who don't think the Collegian opinion page is representative of the views of K-State students.

Every semester we run help-wanted advertisements for the next semester's staff.

WHY WE CARE

We are on a search for some intelligent, well-informed students to contribute to our editorial board.

Yet, we can't help but notice those of you who complain the most aren't the ones who get involved with the Collegian staff.

We understand that many of you have no interest in writing articles on the Landon Lecture Series or covering the live music scene in Aggievilleon Friday nights.

But we are interested in hearing your opinions. We really want to know what you think.

So, we're giving you a chance to contribute.

We are looking for more editorial board members to contribute to the daily editorials.

It is a paid position. No, you're not going to get rich, but we know that every little bit helps.

We meet for 30 minutes to an hour a day so it's not a tremendous time commitment.

As if that's not enough, you could be part of the Collegian page most complained about by Student Senate.

As a member of the editorial board, you will meet with the editors and the other members of the board to discuss various topics of interest to the student body.

We do not require you to be a journalism major, and we encourage all majors and classes to apply.

You will also get the opportunity to work on one of the most successful college newspapers in the country. And that looks good on your résumé.

Sure it sounds glamorous. That's why we're here.

But there is some work involved. We want to get creative people with well-reasoned arguments.

Does that sound like you?

Now that President Clinton has wrapped up the primary season by, lo and behold, accepting his party's nomination for president, the political dogfights can really kick into high gear.

Here in Kansas, this political season could very well bear marked similarities to the recent K-State victory against Texas Tech; ugly, down to the wire, and if you make the Democrats analogous to K-State, exhilarating in the end even though everyone believes you should have lost.

This week I'm going to analyze many of the races we're going to be voting on in this area. I'll be doing this in my usual totally non-partisan and objective manner.

On the national front, look for four more years of Clinton in the White House. I take little more thrill in this than Rush Limbaugh. Clinton is a puppet of big business and should be more appropriately labeled a Republicrat.

Barely is he preferable to Bob Dole. On a scale of one to 100, Clinton would receive a 10 to Dole's eight. It will be a landslide, though, with Clinton receiving 42 percent of the vote to Dole's 35 percent. Ross Perot will receive about 23 percent.

> "Look for four more years of Clinton in the White House. I take little more thrill in this than Rush Limbaugh. Clinton is a puppet of big business and should be more appropriately labeled a Republicrat."

In Kansas, we have the unique opportunity to elect two senators this year. Going for Nancy Kassebaum's seat will be Republican Pat Roberts and Democrat Sally Thompson. Trying for Bob Dole's unexpired two-year term are Republican Sam Brownback and Democrat Jill Docking.

The first of the two races will, unfortunately, be a snoozer. Roberts enjoys widespread popularity in the state due to his contributions to agriculture, whereas Thompson's campaign has yet to show it can kick into high gear. Look for Roberts to win 56 percent to 44 percent.

The other race should be much more interesting. Although Brownback enjoys widespread support among the Republican Party faithful, he has a number of liabilities Docking's team could exploit if it is able to.

Docking, on the other hand, is the Democrat's answer to Nancy Kassebaum. As the voters get to know her, they'll like her better. Look for an increasingly desperate Brownback to engage in more and more negative campaigning and barely emerge victorious at 51 percent to 49 percent.

In Kansas' four races for the House of Representatives, look for some real doozies. In the 1st District, Republican Jerry Moran is taking on Democrat John Divine. Because it is 1st District, look for Moran to take it easily.

This isn't all that bad, though, because Moran is by far the best Republican nominated in any of the federal races. As scant a praise as this is, Moran will probably not do too badly in Congress. None of the other Republicans share this trait.

Here in the 2nd District, Republican and former Olympian Jim Ryun is going up against Democrat John Frieden. Ryun, who won a silver medal in 1968, is now a Christian Coalition point man. His views fall somewhere between those of Pat Robertson and Fred Phelps.

As more about Ryun is made public, look for Frieden to inch ahead in this race. Final result — Frieden 52 percent, Ryun 48 percent.

In the 3rd district, Republican Vince Snowbarger is running against Democrat Judy Hancock.

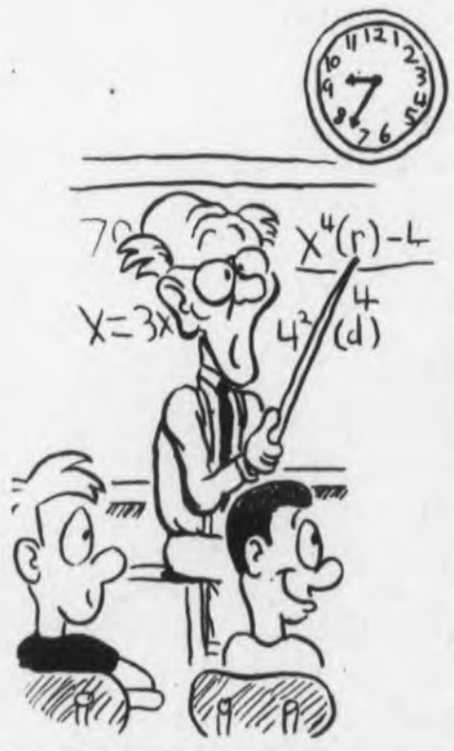
Snowbarger is as fiscally conservative as they get. Hancock actually has more in common with Jan Myers, whose district this was, than Snowbarger. So far, though, it doesn't appear Hancock is in gear for this election.

If Hancock gets going, look for this race to tighten up. This race could be decided by the smallest margin of any of the races.

Finally in the 4th District, Republican incumbent Todd Tiahrt is being challenged by Democrat Randy Rathbun.

Tiahrt is thought by many to be the most inept congressman to come out of Kansas in quite some time. In addition, he has vocally defended militias and has devoted his tenure to an attempted dismantling of the federal government. Look for Rathbun to whollop Tiahrt 60 percent to 40 percent.

Locally, Democratic incumbent Sheila Hochhauser is being challenged by ex-K-State student body president and Republican Jeff Peterson for the State House of Representatives.



For those who remember Peterson's tenure as student body president, the question becomes why the Republicans in this area would want him representing them on the ticket. Look for an easy Hochhauser victory.

In the coming weeks look for more in-depth analysis of many of these races. Also please feel free to write expressing your disagreement or agreement with me.

We gotta DANCE

'Macarena' fulfills one of our basic needs

The other morning I was in my bedroom coiffing and listening to Gabriela de la Paz when the last song on the tape, my favorite, began.

"Dale a tu cuerpo alegria, Macarena,

Que tu cuerpo es pa' dale alegria y cosa buena.

Dale a tu cuerpo alegria, Macarena.

Hey, Macarena!"

Granted, this was the relatively tame, one-woman-with-acoustic-guitar version of the song, which I had picked up in Mexico this summer, but I still couldn't help myself.

MY

Keely SCHIELDS

I had to put down the curling iron and do the dance right then and there.

When the song was over, I rewound it and did it again.

Then, racing into my 9:30 a.m. class at about 9:32, I started to wonder what it was about this thoroughly frivolous song that could coax me into making myself late to class.

For one thing, it's not that great of a song. To compare it with another form of artistic expression, "Macarena" doesn't exactly rank up there with a Camarena painting.

For another, the song is all about this vain coquette, who, to hear her talk, sounds a little on the morally lax side.

Yet it is irresistible.

Even if your brain can't make heads or tails of the chorus, your body understands, and you soon find yourself caught up in the dance with everyone else.

The dance appears to have become something of a rage here lately. These days you can scarcely turn around without running into the seductively outstretched arms of someone dancing the "Macarena." My mother said Regis and Kathy Lee actually did the dance every day for a week. At that point, I knew it was a phenomenon.

My theory on the immense popularity and staying power of this particular song is it fulfills a fundamental need — the need to dance.

It's a need I think a lot of people have forgotten over the past few years. In this time of widely varied tastes, there exists a body of music most of us can admire, appreciate, and allow to occupy the permanent spots in our compact-disc changers. But the one thing you can't do with it is dance to it.

It wasn't until my summer trip to Mexico and my multiple excursions to such discotecas as La Boom and Zumbale that I realized exactly what I wasn't getting from R.E.M. or Pearl Jam.

In the midst of the many sweaty bodies, thrusting and hip-shaking from midnight until 6 a.m. to the same beat (with occasionally changing "da, da, das" and "boom, booms"), I felt a part of something vital.

Noting the similarity of the "Macarena" to country line dancing, it's easy to see that dancing is no less vital in Manhattan.

After all, how else do you explain the popularity of country music?

It may have lost something of its twang, but its lyrics are still as corny as ever.

The one time I ventured into T.W. Longhorn's, some guy literally pulled me onto the floor and made me dance.

Considering how much I hated the song that was playing, I was surprised to find the dancing mildly pleasant.

Still, I wasn't utterly enthralled with the place, so I asked this guy if he came there often, and when he nodded, I asked him why. He told me he could sit in his living room or in some other bar and drink beer any old time, but this place was his favorite because it was where he came to dance.

I can respect that.

Now I may have just reached no more momentous conclusion than the generally acknowledged truth that dancing, no matter what kind, is good, but I wouldn't want anyone to forget that.

In fact, it seems to me that college students need to dance a little more than everyone else.

So get yourself to some place where you can dance, and if you can't get there, well, get your own copy of "Macarena."

JumboTron not all that

Editor,

I was there this Saturday at the game, yelling, screaming, jumping, getting sunburned and enjoying myself the whole time.

I'd like to bring attention to some things that bothered me, and I hope I'm not alone in feeling this way.

I expected to see an Instant Replay Screen at the stadium, but instead I saw an oversized family-room television full of commercials.

Standing in the student section very near the television, I was attempting to construct makeshift ear plugs out of my ticket stub to ease the pain these overpowering commercials were causing me.

How disappointing it must have been for the K-State Marching Band, for the Classy Cats, for the cheerleaders who are all equally drowned out by the television, and for the students who walked away from the game with ear-splitting headaches.

It seems school tradition and spirit such as playing the Wabash Cannonball during team timeouts now come second to commercials for sponsors such as Coors Light, which, ironically, is a product not even allowed in the stadium.

It is so exciting to go to the stadium on Saturday and participate in traditions such as the "Another Wildcat first down" yell, sing Wildcat Victory when the band finishes pregame, and the many others that fans are used to at football games.

If playing past-Wildcat-football-games-that-don't-pertain-to-anything-going-on-at-the-current-game highlights and the barrage of TV commercials on the so-called Instant Replay Screen is going to be the newfound tradition at KSU Stadium, I speak for myself, and possibly for other fans, when I say attending K-State football games won't excite me too much anymore.

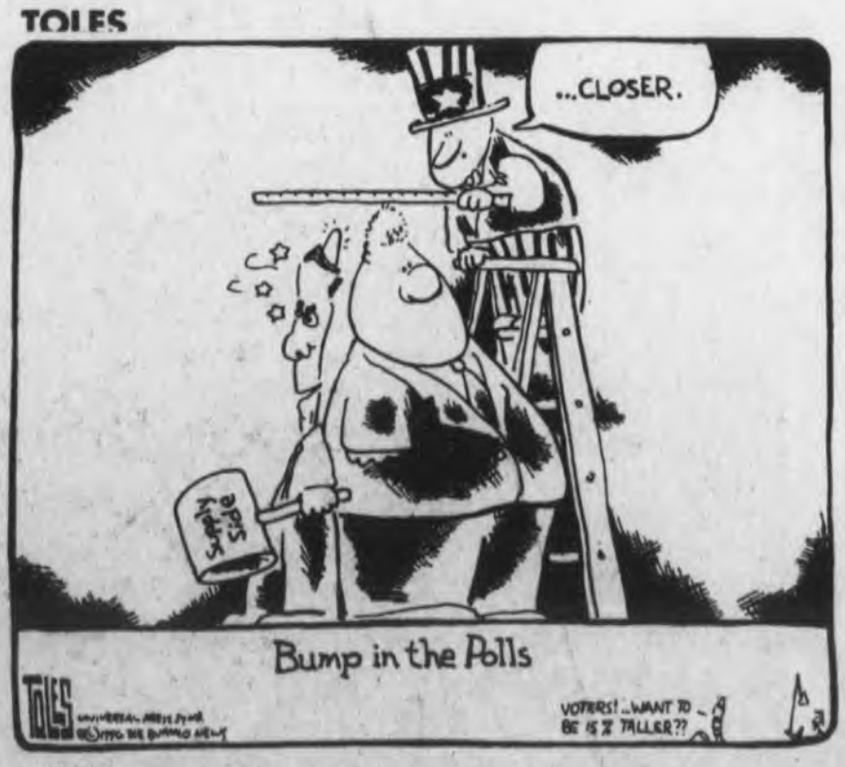
Coverage of MCC deaths

Editor,



On behalf of President Kenneth Cable, the faculty, staff and students of the Manhattan Christian College, I would like to express our sincere appreciation for the fine articles pertaining to the tragic accident of our campus team on July 27 and the memorial service on Aug. 28-29.

Jill Story did an outstanding job in writing the stories, and photographer Cary Conover used excellent judgment during the memorial service.

The last month has been a difficult time for Manhattan Christian College. However, we face the new school year with renewed vigor and purpose in light of this tragedy and examples set by these students. Thank you for your participation in the healing process. We appreciate the support from the other side of Anderson Avenue.

vocals. Tucker also sang a rendition of Louis Armstrong's "What a Wonderful World." He masterfully imitated Armstrong's deep, hypnotic voice, thrilling the crowd, which led to a standing ovation.

The Scamps left nothing undone. The hour-long jam session left the audience craving more. By the time they left the stage, they had stolen the show.

The Woody Herman Orchestra, under the direction of Frank Tiberi, seemed to be going through the motions.

Its performance seemed to have no direction, swinging between fast- and slow-paced extremes.

Solos by the various members of the band seemed devoid of emotion. In between songs the orchestra members shuffled through their sheet music, looking for the next song, while band leader Tiberi talked the crowd into a passive stare.

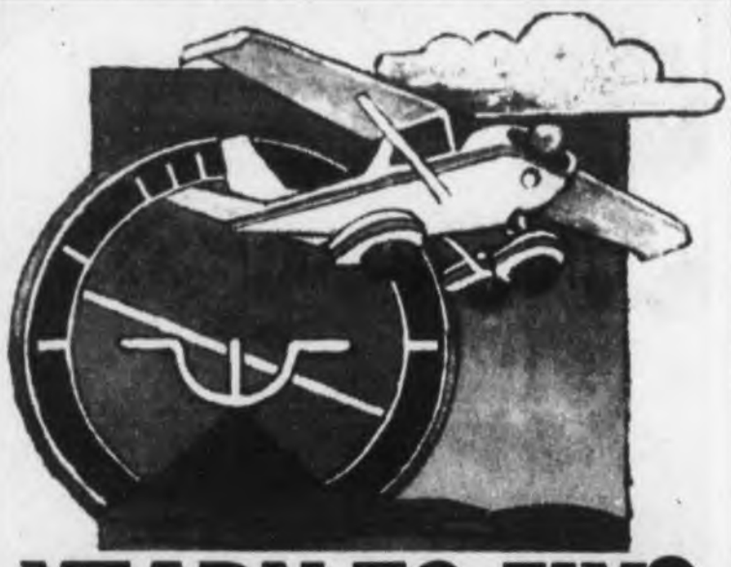
The Woody Herman Orchestra did redeem itself with its closing tune, "Woodchopper's Ball."

This song had a funky opening bass rift that got the crowd clapping along in an excited re-awakening.

Tank failure ruled out as cause of TWA crash

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SMITHTOWN, N.Y. — Preliminary testing by Boeing Co. indicates that an explosion of the center fuel tank alone would not have been powerful enough to bring down TWA Flight 800, an investigator told the Associated Press on Monday.



Those early findings tend to strengthen the theory that a bomb or missile brought down the jumbo jet and weaken the likelihood that the plane exploded because of a mechanical malfunction. While investigators say they do not know enough to declare the explosion a criminal act, the possibility of an accident appears more remote as the evidence mounts.

National Transportation Safety Board investigators previously have determined that the center fuel tank exploded. But a critical question has been whether that explosion was the cause of the crash — or if it was a secondary blast ignited by another force.

After using computer models to simulate pressure within a 747's center fuel tank, Boeing engineers estimated that 30-40 pounds per square inch of pressure inside the tank would be needed to do the kind of damage that has been observed so far in Flight 800, the report found.

Testing indicates that an internal explosion of the tank, caused by a malfunction, would generate a third less pressure than that.

Governor's office in need of facelift

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — With more than 70,000 tourists walking through the doors of the governor's office each year, a ragged, worn look just won't do.

Like much of the statehouse, Gov. Bill Graves' office sorely needs some tender loving care. And Linda Graves, his wife, wants it done right: in the late Victorian era to conform with the office's original style.

She asked the Kansas State Historical Society earlier this year how to appropriately decorate the office, where proclamations are signed and dignitaries welcomed.

"It was a hodgepodge and not functional, from my point of view," Linda Graves said. "My husband is the type of man who would conduct the business of governor from the back of a garage if they told him that's where it was done. But this office was simply not an appropriate setting for the chief of state. It was just worn out."

Some of the society's top officials decided it might be best if the people of Kansas took ownership of the office and chose for themselves what to put in it.

So the Committee to Furnish the Governor's Reception Office was formed. Made up of Kansans representing museums and historical societies around the state, the seven-member team has researched state furnishings and developed a list of items that would complement the capitol's historic atmosphere.

So far, there is no estimate of what the effort will cost, in part because state officials hope Kansans will step forward and donate many of the needed items. Donations of money will also be accepted.

"People are interested in donating things to museums because they know things will be cared for and people will see them," said Jami Frazier Tracy, curator of collections at the Wichita/Sedgwick County Historical Museum.

"The same thing can happen with the governor's office," Tracy said. "Other people can see the objects and enjoy them. It will be something the whole state will be proud of."

The governor's office, in the statehouse's east wing, was built in 1873.

Only a few historic features remain: Mahogany paneling, a fireplace with a hand-carved mantel and the 10-foot-tall secretary bookcase that belonged to Gov. Thomas Carney, the state's second governor, who served during the Civil War.

The desk where Gov. Graves signs proclamations is a reproduction of a 17th-century Jacobean ceremonial desk and is the same desk Gov. Alf Landon used in his two terms.

The other furnishings in the office are badly worn and not in keeping with the remainder of the statehouse.

Cats win first Big 12 game

Thank goodness for defense.

"A victory is a victory," K-State quarterback Brian Kavanagh said. "But we can't put our defense in that position again."

Thanks to its defense, K-State won the inaugural Big 12 Conference game, 21-14, over Texas Tech.

K-State coach Bill Snyder said the game was a gut-check for the Wildcats.

"We played well enough to win, but we didn't play the way we're capable of playing," Snyder said.

One statistic that caught Snyder's eyes was total plays. Texas Tech had 103 offensive plays. The Cats had only 57. Snyder said his defense can't be put on the field that much every week.

"Now that I think about it, I'm going to go down and give them all IVs," Snyder said.

The long day started on the first series of the game. Texas Tech drove into K-State territory, but kicker Tony Rogers missed a 53-yard field-goal attempt to bail out K-State's defense.

That miss was just the start of a long day for the Tech special teams, which missed four field goals, one blocked by wide receiver Kevin Lockett and had a snap sail over punter Jeremy Hernandez's head, resulting in a touchdown for K-State.

"We stunk up the kicking game," Texas Tech coach Spike Dykes said. "When you do that you're not going to win ball games."

But K-State did its best to make it interesting.

After second-quarter touchdowns on a one-yard sneak from Kavanagh and a 17-yard reception by wide receiver Jimmy Dean, the Cats took a 14-3 lead into halftime. The Cats then extended the lead to 21-3 on the botched punt that free safety Mario Smith recovered in the end zone for a touchdown.

Tech, however, wouldn't go down quietly.

On the ensuing drive, quarterback Zebbie Lethridge led the Red Raiders 80 yards and 20 plays, capping it off with a 14-yard touchdown pass to fullback Sammy Morris.

A two-point conversion and a field goal later, the Cat lead was trimmed to seven.

Lockett said the offense could not get in a rhythm, keeping the defense on the field for most of the second half.

"It seemed like every series we got one thing corrected and then something else went wrong," Lockett said.

Thanks to another Cat miscue, Tech got the ball back with 2:18 left on the clock, 50 yards from the tying touchdown, but the Cat defense clamped down when it had to.

With 44 seconds left and facing a fourth-and-18, Lethridge hit split end Donnie Hart over the middle and the first-down marker, but the play was broken up by cornerback Lamar Chapman and a big hit from Smith.

Smith said he read the play early and was able to help Chapman out on the coverage.

"They tried to isolate Lamar Chapman. At one point the receiver actually had the ball in his hands," Smith said. "I just came across the top and laid a hit on him."

Snyder said Smith is the kind of player who always comes through when K-State needs him.

"Mario is Mario," Snyder said. "If there's a guy who's going to step up and make plays when you need plays, it's Mario Smith."

After Smith's hit, the Cats got the ball back on downs. As Kavanagh took a knee, the clock ran out and the Cats went into the record books as winners of the first Big 12 game.

Still, Snyder stood by his earlier statements, saying he did not like a game the magnitude of Texas Tech to

Led by Chapman, Smith secondary answers questions

LAMAR CHAPMAN holds up Texas Tech's Donnie Hart for a big hit by Mario Smith in the Red Raiders' unsuccessful and final drive Saturday at KSU Stadium. Smith's hit on Hart knocked the ball loose and brought the game to a halt while Tech trainers made sure Hart's neck was not injured.

For the Wildcat defensive backfield, Saturday's game provided some relatively inexperienced players with the opportunity to prove themselves.

With all-Big 8 cornerback Joe Gordon out for the first few weeks of the season and safety Chuck Marlowe graduated, there was a big question mark at defensive back heading into the season.

It appears, though, after Saturday's 21-14 win against Texas Tech, the Cats found some answers — answers they were happy to see.

Chapman

Redshirt freshman Lamar Chapman had an impressive second half after a tough first half in which he gave up a 45-yard pass play to Texas Tech's Stacy Mitchell.

"I'm really proud of him," Coach Bill Snyder said.

"That was a significant thing for him to come back and play as well as he did, after they (Texas Tech) picked at him pretty good."

Chapman rose to the occasion when the game was on the line. With K-State leading 21-14 and less than a minute to play, Texas Tech faced a fourth down and 18 with the ball at the Red Raider 21-yard line.

With all-America cornerback Chris Canty on one side, it was obvious Texas Tech was going to pick on Chapman.

"We were in a man coverage, and I knew they were going to come at me because they had been coming at me all day," Chapman said.

Red Raider wideout Donnie Hart ran a deep slant against Chapman and gained a step on the Cat defender as Hart ran across the middle. Hart leaped into the air to catch quarterback Zebbie Lethridge's pass.

> "The ball was in his hands, and he was in the air, and I just lowered the boom."
> • MARIO SMITH
> WILDCAT DEFENSIVE BACK

The split-second when the ball reached the arms of Hart, Chapman nailed him from behind. With the help of free safety Mario Smith coming from the other direction, the ball was jarred loose. It was arguably the biggest play of the game for the Wildcats.

"I looked up and saw Chap (Chapman) on him and Mario (Smith) breaking on the ball, and I knew the game was ours," Canty said.

"The ball was in his hands, and he was in the air, and I just lowered the boom," said Smith, who assisted Chapman on the play.

Smith also played a large part on the special teams, recovering a fumble in the end zone early in the fourth quarter. Texas Tech long-snapper Brad Spinks snapped the ball over the head of punter Jeremy Hernandez.

"If there's a guy that's going to step up and make plays when you have to make plays, it's going to be Mario Smith," Snyder said.

Also seeing considerable time at Gordon's vacated spot was Demetric Denmark, who redshirted last season after transferring from Dodge City Community

K-State, Tech game was as ugly as your prom date was Maybe it was a tad ugly. OK, maybe it's not something you want to bring home to mom.

Even moms deserve better. Moms have standards.

But a win is a win and I am a happy, happy man.

Forget for a second quarterback Brian Kavanagh's horrendous 12-for-29 passing.

So maybe the rushing attack's negative 12 yards reminds you of the prom date you swore was just having a bad hair day.

But the bottom line is the result is the same. The Cats won. You went to the prom, and even though your mom never met the girl, she was just happy her son went.

I love the fact K-State won Saturday.

Todd
STEWART

There is a slim line between good teams and great teams. Good teams win while playing well. Great teams win even when they don't.

Sure, K-State has not proven itself to be a great team just yet, but keep your head up.

Just as that prom date did get her hair cut and finally found the aerobics room, these Cats will turn out beautiful in the end.

The Cats will practice. The Cats will work out the flaws. Even Coach Bill Snyder said the faults are mendable.

"These are things that are easy to correct," Snyder said.

I think Snyder is right.

Sooner or later, Kavanagh will remember receivers prefer balls thrown in the hands. Or somewhere in the vicinity.

Sooner or later, the offensive line will remember when it comes to run-blocking, it is usually a good thing to block that guy right in front of you. Running backs like that.

The defensive line will some day realize it is OK to tackle that guy who just ran by. He won't hurt you.

But, all-in-all, believe it or not, I am happy. The Cats have five weeks before their next Big 12 game against Nebraska and three tune-up games to prepare for it.

Now, I'm not saying the Cats will beat Nebraska. But it will be a different team in five weeks. Call it the Wildcat make over your prom date never got.

It's all going to be OK.

Think about it for a second. K-State defeated a team that went to the Cotton Bowl two years ago, won the Copper Bowl last year, going 9-3 and finishing in the Top 20.

K-State beat a legitimate football power and still you heard excuses. Excuses for winning.

"We've probably played the worst offensive game we ever played," wide receiver Kevin Lockett said.

Lockett's quarterback agreed.

"Offensively the game was disgusting," Kavanagh said.

Listen to what they are saying.

They beat a good, good team, and players are upset.

All of that leads me to say, worry not my Wildcat faithful, things will look brighter.

> K-State beat a legitimate football power and still you heard excuses. Excuses for winning.

This was a great learning experience for the Cats. The Cats learned so much from this game and it will show down the road.

Dwell on this for a second.

Your prom date has learned a lesson from that date so many years ago. The girl you tried so hard to get rid of is now the most beautiful girl you see. And the one you desire most.

She remembers how you treated her. In a situation filled with irony, it is she who now won't give you the time of day.

I learned my lesson from that prom date. I will stand true to the Cats. The Cats will turn out beautiful in the end.

I'll put in my time right now and so should you. In the end, we'll be the ones standing next to the most beautiful team in the world while everyone is left in the dust.

This bandwagon will not let anyone else on.

It was ugly yes, but stay true.

If I can do it, anyone can.

Listen to Todd. Over my life I've received the short end of relationships with women way too often.

Even though I can't change that now, I will not let myself go sour with these Cats. I couldn't let myself do that.

One bad prom date is enough to live with.

A Plethora of Purple

More than 43,000 attend inaugural Big 12 match-up

Saturday afternoon a crowd of more than 43,000 purple-and-white-clad Wildcat fans stood ready to witness the battle its team was about to undertake.

With faces painted, like brave soldiers, some chanted to spark spirits. Others stomped their feet to show team support.

Above the crowd a hazy sky loomed over the day, but not even the steamy surroundings could take away from the Wildcat spirit in the air.

The massive sea of purple-and-white fans stood ready for whatever the day might bring, as long as it was a Wildcat victory. However, this was not an ordinary Saturday afternoon of K-State football in Manhattan.

This was the dawning of an era. This was the birth of Big 12 Conference football in the Little Apple.

The fans seemed to follow suit by bringing every bit of enthusiasm, pride Wildcat spirit they could invoke to the inaugural game.

Prior to kickoff, a plethora of purple-and-hite pompons pulsated throughout the crowd, sparking purple pride among the masses. All the crowd at KSU Stadium were there for one reason — to see the Wildcats walk away with a victory.

The crowd felt excitement and camaraderie everywhere. Nothing could flaw this day of K-State football.

From the brand-new JumboTron to the new outfits of the Classy Cats, K-State fans were ecstatic.

"I love the big screen, man," one fan said. "That's what we need in our room."

By kickoff time, fans were sweltering in the glaring sun that fell over the Little Apple. Some who were overwhelmed by the heat gathered under the east-side bleachers to escape the stifling conditions.

Crystal Cross, Great Bend, said she headed under the stands to seek some relief from the heat. She brought her infant foster daughter down out of the stands because it was so unbearable.

"I came down because it's just so hot," she said.

Assorted armchair quarterbacks in the student section could be heard sharing their football genius with the rest of the crowd.

"It's gonna be an inside hand-off," one Chad May wanna-be said.

"Maybe not," he said after the play, which turned out to be a pass.

"Outrun him, outrun him!" another fan shouted.

"That's right," he said after the runner complied.

Camelia Owens, senior in social work, and her mother, Ida Leupold, both of Manhattan, said they prefer the student section for one simple reason.

"Those other people are prudes," Leupold said. "We like enthusiastic people."

Leupold said she and her daughter have come to every K-State home game for the last four years, and since last season they have tried to make every game special by showing off their purple pride.

Clad in K-State's colors from head to toe, including purple wigs, faces, shoelaces and even purple toenails, the mother-daughter duo said it has high expectations of the Wildcat team this year.

"We stand to beat Nebraska this year," Owens said.

A victory against Nebraska notwithstanding, a win against Texas Tech is what filled the minds of most fans in the stadium.

That is, except for the large handful of Red Raider fans who crammed in the southeast section of the field to watch their team play.

Kyle Rogers, who traveled from Lubbock, Texas, to see the Red Raiders, said he thought his team had a pretty good chance of beating the Cats, despite their lead late in the third quarter.

Rogers added he was impressed with the nearly $3-million investment made to put in new scoreboards and the Sony JumboTron that illuminates the north end of KSU Stadium.

"It's real helpful," Rogers said, "especially when you're sitting in the end zone like we are."

"We're kinda loud," Kittie Orr, 1942 K-State graduate, said. "But that doesn't mean everyone else is."

Orr and her husband have been season-ticket holders for 20 years. She added that years ago there wasn't too much to be excited about on Saturdays in Manhattan, but now, she said, K-State football is great.

"We've got purple blood in our veins," Orr said. "It's just great. There's great spirit."

> "We've got purple blood in our veins. It's just great. There's a great spirit."
> • KITTIE ORR
> 1942 K-STATE GRADUATE

Halfway through the fourth quarter, when the game appeared to be locked up, fans began to slowly trickle out of the stadium.

Dolly Alonso, senior in theater, said she left her ICAT seats early because she wanted to escape any potential traffic problems, not because the Cats weren't impressive in their Big 12 debut.

"Since my sophomore year I have been going to games," she said.

"In my five years at K-State, this has been one of the greatest games I've been to."

Nearly four hours after kickoff, the Wildcats chalked up a W for their season opener.

The freshly painted purple cheeks that showcased Wildcat spirit at the start of the game were giving way to smeared faces and worn-out looks.

The purple-and-white pompons looked like the fans — a little worn-out and tattered.

But the end had been achieved — a day in the limelight for the Cats was a day in the sun for the fans.

The common thread of Wildcat unity that had sewn 43,000 screaming fans together at the start of the day was still wound tightly by day's end.

It doesn't appear to be unraveling any time soon.

Hucks, dumps, clogs and hospital throws

Ultimate vocabulary

Ultimate Frisbee has a language all its own. To help readers understand the language, the Collegian has compiled a mini-dictionary of useful terms.

HUCK – A long throw.
CHUCK – See Huck.
DUMP – A pass to a receiver behind the handler.
DISC – What Ultimate players call a Frisbee.
CLOG – When the offense is bunched up on the field due to everyone being covered.
GOING Z – When a player dives, either to block, intercept or catch the disk.
HOSPITAL THROW – When the disk is lobbed and floats back down slowly and several people jump for it.
U.D. – An upside-down throw.
STACK – An offensive strategy where players line up on the field. It looks like a stack of players.
PHILOSOPHICAL FOUL – When a player is called for any number of the following things:
a) Spiking the disc.
b) Foul language.
c) Trash talking.
No action is taken; it is just recognized.
THROW AN UGLY – When a player throws a bad throw.

There is a lot more to Ultimate Frisbee than throwing a Frisbee to your teammate.

It takes skill, quickness and an understanding of what is happening.

Once people start playing, they pick up on the game quickly.

"The game itself flows like soccer, cuts like football," Shawn Kokenge, Ultimate Frisbee Club member, said.

"By this I mean that it's like soccer, because you don't get to rest until someone scores, and the objective is to move the Frisbee or disc from one side of the field to the other to score, like football."

The playing field is 70 yards long, with 25-yard long end zones and 40 yards wide.

Seven players line up on opposite sides of the field and each player is assigned to cover the person across from them.

The team with the disc starts out on defense, and hucks the disc across the field to the other team. The handler, usually an experienced player, takes control of the disc and the offense lines up in a stack.

"This basic offensive strategy is when the offense lines up one behind the other, all the way down the length of the field," Kokenge said.

"The first two players cut in opposite directions and try to get open for the handler to throw the disc to them, since the handler can't run with the disc."

At this point, the defensive player who is covering the handler counts to 10, while trying to block any throw the handler might attempt.

If the handler doesn't make a throw by the count of 10, then it is an over, and the defense becomes the offense at the spot of the disc. At this point the team in possession of the disc quickly sets up in a stack and things start over. The first two players in the stack make their cuts, like wide receivers in football, and the defensive players play them like safeties.

When one of the two receivers makes a catch, the stack shifts and lines up on the receiver, who is now the handler. The first two players in the stack make their cuts, while their respective defenders cover them.

If this sounds confusing, don't worry, it is. But newcomers learn quickly when playing the game. Once they play, they are usually hooked.

Mike Hamilton, Manhattan resident and Ultimate player, said he can't get enough of the game.

"The game is so simple, yet so complex, and that's one of the reasons why I like it so much," Hamilton said. "It's cool in terms of, all you need to play is a 175-gram disc and a field. A good pair of cleats are highly recommended.

"There are basically three different throws. The traditional backhand, the two-finger forehand, and the legendary U.D. The U.D. is when a player throws the disc upside-down and the disc floats to the ground," Hamilton said.

> "The game is so simple, yet so complex, and that's one of the reasons why I like it so much."
> • MIKE HAMILTON
> ULTIMATE FRISBEE PLAYER

The players can throw the disc in such a way that it will curve right into the hands of the receiver. The angle that is put on the disc at the time of its release from the thrower's hand determines the degree of curve the disc will travel through the air.

"That stuff is all well and good," Hamilton said, "but playing defense is where it's at. I like going Z. This Kansas grass will leave some nice marks."

Cats begin season with tourney sweep

The K-State volleyball team opened its season at the Northwestern Invitational in excellent fashion. It went undefeated, picking up four wins against Rice, Northwestern, North Carolina State and Southwest Missouri State.

Friday evening, K-State downed Northwestern, 13-15, 16-14, 15-6 and 15-10. It then turned around and defeated Southwest Missouri State in straight sets, 15-8, 15-9 and 15-11.

Saturday, K-State beat Rice, 15-6, 11-15, 15-12 and 15-13 in the first match. The Wildcats closed out the action by beating N.C. State, 14-16, 15-13, 15-1 and 15-7 to capture the tournament title.

Coach Jim Moore said the four wins were a must for his team to accomplish what it wants to this season.

"These were games we had to have," Moore said. "There were teams there that were better than we thought, and it made some of the matches tougher.

"If we're going to get where we want to at the end of the season this year, these were games that we had to win."

Play-set-hitter Toie Young came away with the tournament Most Valuable Player honor, while middle blockers Kate DeClerk and Val Wieck made the all-tournament team.

Five Wildcats finished with double figures in kills against N.C. State. Swing hitter Abbie Brown finished with 14, Young had 12, DeClerk 12, swing hitter Kim Zschau 11 and Wieck 10.

Moore said he was happy to see his whole team get into the action in the final game.

"The thing I was happiest with in the whole tournament was to have five people contribute 10 kills or more in the last match," Moore said. "Volleyball isn't an individual sport. It's a team sport. It's nice to see those kind of stats and show a more balanced effort from our team."

Two players moved higher on the all-time records list with their performances in the tournament. DeClerk became K-State's all-time total block leader with 20 blocks in the tournament. Setter Devon Ryning moved into second place on the schools all-time assists chart (2,457) after 187 assists in the tournament. Her 63 assists in the Northwestern match was a tournament record.

Another bright spot for the Cats in the tournament was that a few leaders emerged to help direct the team.

"(Junior) Devon (Ryning) and the seniors on our team had some great things that happened that helped the team as a whole in disciplining us through the matches," Moore said.

Still, with the four wins and tournament title, Moore said there is a lot of room for improvement on the team's play.

"We didn't even play close to our ability," Moore said. "We've been much, much better in practice. I was a little disappointed with our play in the tournament, but I certainly wasn't disappointed with the results."

"In the latter stages of the ball game, he really jumped up and made some nice plays," Snyder said.

Canty was his usual self, providing such a large threat the Red Raiders rarely threw to his side of the field.

After eight interceptions last season, Canty said he realizes opposing teams will focus on the younger, more inexperienced players in the Wildcat secondary.

"If they don't come my way then obviously I'm going to do the things to make the big plays," Canty said.

"I just go out every play and stay on my toes."

The Wildcat secondary was definitely on its toes Saturday, holding Lethridge to just 17 of 48 passing.

"This is a new experience for us. We've never opened with an opponent the quality of Texas Tech," Snyder said. "I assure you this is a significant win for this football team."

In the Big 12 opener, it was defense that reigned supreme and had the offense giving thanks.

Lockett, who had five receptions and 62 yards on the day, said the victory belongs to the defense.

"Without our defense in the second half there's no way we would have won the game," Lockett said. "This one definitely goes to the defense."

Values attract new students to private schools

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — In the often-tumultuous Kansas City public schools, rising enrollment in private schools is no surprise.

But the trend is also being seen on the other side of the state line, even in affluent Johnson County, where the public schools are known for high test scores and national awards.

Mary Daly of Overland Park has sent her children to city schools since moving to the area three years ago. But this year she's sending her daughter Kate to Notre Dame de Sion, a Catholic school with its largest freshman class in several years.

"It was wonderful; I have no ill feelings. It was a good education. It's just different," Daly said of sending her children to public school.

Indeed, her son will continue going to city schools until high school, when he will switch to a Catholic school.

She listed the reasons she likes private schools: safety, smaller classes, uniforms so there's no pressure to conform, and values.

"It's a totally different atmosphere," she said.

Daly is part of a wave of parents sending their children to private schools. To accommodate the flood of students, private schools are adding programs and buildings. They're also adding to their waiting lists.

"Parents are telling us, 'Secular education is fine.' But they want more," said Marna Courson of Notre Dame de Sion. "People want strong academics and values. They're saying, 'We want to give our kids every possible leg up in this incredibly competitive society.'"

After 10 years of decreasing class sizes, the 1996 graduating class of Notre Dame de Sion was the smallest in a long time — 35 girls. But that may have been the low point.

The class that will graduate in 1997 has 49 girls, and the classes that follow are larger. The class of 2000, this year's freshman class, has 100 girls, and more are waiting to get in.

> "I find private schools don't put up with the disruptions. You're there to learn. If you have another agenda, you need to be someplace else."
> • MARY LISTER
> KANSAS CITY PARENT

Many of the area's Catholic kindergarten through eighth-grade schools are also near capacity, especially in the lower grades.

Secular Kansas City private schools, including Pembroke Hill and Barstow School, are seeing a jump in enrollment as well.

Pembroke expects 1,050 students this fall, the largest enrollment since 1984.

Smaller classes draw many families into private schools. Parents feel that their children — and they — can get more attention from the staff than they could in a 900-student middle school.

For parent Mary Lister, the quality of education, among other things, lured her family away from the Park Hill school district.

Her son now attends Rockhurst High School, and her two younger children go to Holy Cross Lutheran School in Kansas City.

"Everyone is there to work for the child's best," said Lister, who was worried that public schools didn't adequately prepare students for college.

"I find private schools don't put up with the disruptions. You're there to learn. If you have another agenda, you need to be someplace else."

Many people say values can be more easily taught at private schools.

"As one parent put it, it's like invisible arms surround the child with the same values they have at home," said the Rev. Thomas Pesci, president of the Kansas City Independent School Association.

Popular play gets another showing

ABBI HAKE

"The Foreigner" is back in Nichols Theatre, hoping to get more laughs.

The farcical, comedic play that debuted this summer will greet K-State tonight and hopefully get the same response it faced in June.

Marci Maullar, managing director of K-State Theatre, said the production was successful during its three-weekend run.

She said the show will resume to give returning students, new students and returning faculty a chance to experience what some Manhattan residents already have.

"It's hard not to like it 'cause it's just so funny," Maullar said.

The story centers around Charlie Baker, the foreigner, who is discouraged with his wife and marriage, and seeks solace in a southern lodge.

Baker claims his ailing wife has been unfaithful.

"He needs to get away from it all .... She's accused him of being stiff, not taking chances," Maullar said.

He is led there by his friend, Sgt. Froggy LeSeur, played by Jason Miller,

Punk-funk band brings flashback of 1950s dance floors

PAGE GETZ

You couldn't tell whether to two-step, jitterbug or mosh at what was a hoedown of sorts Friday night at the Waydown Lounge.

The hillbilly punk-funk of Wichita's Scroatbelly and nostalgic jive of Lawrence's Chubby Smith 5 confused the natives with a timeless and undefinable integration of sound.

The tangy twang and retro hum of the Lawrence band opened, stirring the crowd through a swinging flashback to the dance floors of the 1950s.

"They swing in a 50s way and inspired lots of cool, soulful dancing. The saxophone really helped things cooking," Dave Kromm, Manhattan resident, said.

CB5's eclectic style often eludes its listeners because it doesn't fall conveniently into any category of music, said Chubby Smith, guitarist and vocalist.

"People try to pigeon hole the music as rockabilly, but we're really not a rockabilly band. It's just rock," he said. "It's old-sounding, and I think that's why they call it that. But it's more like Ray Charles meets ZZ Top."

In May, the band released "Hillbilly Thunder" and will record its second full-length compact disc in September. It's also featured on Hairball VI, "Cough It Up," a compilation disk on Tim Kerr records.

Scroatbelly was signed to Bloodshot Records, a Chicago-based company, and recorded "Daddy's Farm" in July, their first nationally distributed release. The band's first CD, "The Great Alaskan Holiday," was self-released in January 1995 and is available in Manhattan record stores.

While turning out their wallets to show pictures of the 10 kids (one with a Mohawk) between them, Scroatbelly explained its philosophies, prophecies and strategy for music.

"We're not a band. We're a cloud," said Wayne Gottstine, lead guitar and vocalist. "We all synchronize our watches four time-zones apart. We're in four separate directions until we get up on stage, and it all just comes together.

Student union becomes ID center's new home

CECILY RODRIGUEZ
staff reporter

In past years, when students lost their student ID they had to make a journey to the second floor of Willard Hall, but not anymore. The student-ID center is now located behind the check-cashing windows on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

Union administration has taken over the responsibility from the Office of the Registrar.

"The administration felt it was appropriate to have it located in the Union so it would be more accessible for the students," Gunile Devault, associate registrar, said.

K-State administration wanted to relocate the ID center before renovations began on the Union so students would already be familiar with the new location.

To replace their K-State ID, students must pay $10, and they'll need two forms of ID, one with a signature and picture, and one with just a signature. The office is open 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., Monday through Friday.

Geology student questions teaching style and attendance policies

Dear Cassandra, the first day of Introductory Geology 100 was interesting.

Slides of notes were flashed almost as fast as that little guy who thumbs through the pages of the Texas Travel Catalog, in the TV commercial for the benefit of speed-readers and those with photographic memories.

The historical class attendance problem has been brutally and efficiently squelched here.

No student is to be admitted x-number of minutes after class has begun.

Daily quizzes will be given at random times, and no student will be allowed to turn in more than one answer card at the end of class, in order to verify attendance.

Rumor has it, anyone trying to turn in more than one answer card will be shot.

To this end, students enrolled in Geology 100 are presumably going to be required to purchase one bullet at the K-State Union Bookstore for possible use this semester.

My question is, can we as students be required to buy a bullet for such a purpose? I think the University should provide its own ammunition, because most of us are not likely to be shot during the term.

How do you stand on the bullet issue?

P.O.W.

> "Most professors worth their salary will do what they can to make the material accessible."
> • CASSANDRA, ADVICE COLUMNIST

Dear P.O.W.,

First off, I don't stand. I sit quietly in my seat and ask the speed-reader in the seat next to me if she wants to start a study group.

It sounds like there are three issues at hand here: teaching style, attendance and bullets.

We'll take style first (because I am the Collegian's most stylish staffer). The problem of effective instruction in a room with 300 students has been a problem since President Jon Wefald was an undergrad.

If your instructors go through the material too fast, talk to them after class.

Most professors worth their salary will do what they can to make the material accessible.

If not that's what evaluations are for.

And don't be afraid to take your problems to a higher authority.

If nothing changes, drop the class and talk to the department head or the provost.

On to attendance. I've always thought instructors should have the prerogative to set their own attendance policies, and students have the prerogative to play along at their own risk.

In most cases, strict attendance policies are the result of too many years of greek and residence hall test files.

Finally, bullets. While the University has no policy against requiring the purchase of ammunition, students will have to wait a couple weeks.

The Union Bookstore, in compliance with the Brady Bill, is in the process of forwarding background checks to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms in Washington, D.C. This means you have some freedom at the beginning of class.

Personally, I think the waiting period is a good idea. It keeps liberal columnists like Lach Franquemont from protesting outside your classroom and further disrupting your note-taking.

Cassandra

P.S. I have spoken with Anna Holcombe, head of the art department, and it looks like next semester the metalsmithing classes will be forging bullets for sale at discount prices, thus utilizing University resources and saving students money.

Revived Ford tractors bring life, new prosperity to African farmers

ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

Chris Akhimien's mission in life might just be to save an entire continent.

A native of Nigeria, he said his goal was to make Africans self-reliant, by providing a tractor.

The tractors that have been sent to Africa so far are at training and university farms.

Though Akhimien said no tractors have actually been used by private farmers, he estimates one tractor can help feed 50-60 people.

He started a not-for-profit organization, Tractors for Our Daily Bread, hoping to save many Africans from a life of starvation and back-breaking farm labor.

The organization was born in 1990, while Akhimien was a graduate student in agricultural economics at K-State.

With help from Manhattan residents and volunteers from around the nation, his dream is being realized.

Debra Frey and David Frey are residents of Manhattan and volunteers in TFODB. Debra, who volunteers at least 40 hours each week, helps arrange the necessary steps to get a Ford 8N tractor from a field in Kansas to a field in Africa.

Debra said a difficult part of her job is tapping into the right resources — that is, finding volunteers to work on tractors.

The 50-year-old tractors are donated to TFODB, the organization then repairs them.

Fixing the tractors so that they are in near-perfect condition takes from 50 to 100 hours of volunteer labor. Volunteers sandblast the tractors to remove rust, paint them, totally repair the engine and make sure the tractor is in perfect working order. A plow, planters, disc and cultivator are also repaired and painted.

Debra Frey said a tractor with all the implements costs about $10,000 to completely repair and send to Africa.

Debra Frey said there are many advantages to a Ford 8N tractor compared to others. The simply designed tractor is both powerful for its size, yet easy to repair.

Akhimien said in Africa farmers have large families so that they can produce more food, because they lack simple-technology tractors like the Ford 8N.

He described the farming as labor-intensive and back-breaking. The tools used are large wooden clubs, with steel spades attached.

Debra Frey and Akhimien said the Ford 8N would allow families in Africa to improve their standard of living, improve the economy and allow families to stay smaller because a large family wouldn't be necessary to farm the land.

Akhimien now works at a bank in Wilinmington, Del., where he has started another TFODB office.

Even though he and his wife, Tina, spend much of their time with their four children, Chris Akhimien said it's all worth the time he has spent on the project.

"I'm enjoying what I'm doing. That's the key factor," he said.

A third TFODB office is located in Longview, Wash.

African farming

- More than 500,000 Ford 8N tractors were made between 1947 and 1952.
- Twenty-two percent of the potential arable land in Africa is presently being cultivated.
- Fifty-four percent of Nigeria's work force is empoyed on small, labor-intensive farms.
- Seventy percent of Kenyans are employed in agriculture on farms two hectacres or less in size.

From floods to games, TV truck gets news out

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

From football games to the presidential race, K-State's Regents Educational Communications Center covers it all.

The ECC helps television networks cover special news events with a mobile satellite uplink truck. The truck was subcontracted out to ABC Saturday to broadcast K-State's first Big 12 game.

ABC brought in its own mobile unit and cameras and fed the audio to the truck. This sent out live video footage to their affiliate stations across the country.

Mel Chastain, director of ECC, said the ECC has bids out to cover other future K-State games.

In addition to live football coverage, CBS used the truck to bring live reports of Dole's announcement of Jack Kemp as his vice-presidential running mate.

The truck was also used in the 1992 elections, when it traveled to Houston to cover President Bush's headquarters.

"Revenues from renting out the truck for commercial use go to the ECC and K-State for academic programs," Susan Jagerson, coordinator of ECC, said.

Although the truck has covered football games, elections and the floods in 1993, its top priority is education.

The ECC distributes interactive courses from other campuses to K-State. Jagerson said that the truck is only used for commercial broadcasting if it doesn't interfere with educational uses.

"We're like Merle Haggard on acid," he said.

Most of the crowd was absorbed in the grind and zoom, while others identified with its wit and grassroots approach to life.

"Scroatbelly is the only punk rock band that understands what it's like to grow up on a Kansas farm," said Neil Miller, graduate student in entomology. "They're all farm kids from Wichita. Their lyrics are about smoking Kansas weed and stuff like that."

Scroatbelly began as an all-acoustic band featuring a mandolin and banjo and then merged with Hulapopper, a basic rock band made up of members of Technicolor Headrush, a twisted blend of pipe-dream harmonics.

The result was sort of an undefinable and contagiously psychedelic country-punk mesh.

The innovative but classic grooves were an irrigating cultivation, a mutt of music culture that some didn't expect to find in the Little Apple.

"I just came from Austin, Texas, where there's a really big scene, and I'm really impressed to see something like this in a place like Manhattan, Kansas," Jeff Chan, graduate student in English, said.

> "We're not a band. We're a cloud. We're like Merle Haggard on acid."

Kurdish area that would include northern Iraq, but the KDP is willing to work with Saddam's government in exchange for greater autonomy, while the PUK will accept only independence and has allied itself with Iraq's archrival, Iran.

In Salah ad-Din, a stronghold of the KDP, guerrillas celebrated their victory Monday by parading through town and showing off captured artillery.

As a military truck towed two anti-aircraft guns down a street, KDP fighters sat on top of the weapons and shouted jubilantly, raising their machine guns above their heads.

Few refugees came to Salah ad-Din; those who arrived said most of the others had fled to PUK-controlled areas and beyond.

"Hundreds, maybe thousands, fled Irbil," Hursid said, "mostly to Iran."

She and her four children, ages 5 to 10, stood on a sidewalk on the road from Irbil to Salah ad-Din after fleeing on Sunday.

"I saw many people dead," she said. "My husband was also killed. I ran out with my children, fearing for our lives. I don't know where we will go."

There was no power in the town, and the nighttime streets were dark except for the headlights of military trucks. Some local officials said a hydroelectric dam had been damaged by artillery; others said the rival PUK had control of the dam and had cut their electricity.

PUK leader Jalal Talabani called on Western nations to retaliate against Iraq for the offensive in Irbil.

"Saddam Hussein must be punished and must pay the price of the crimes which he committed inside Irbil," Talabani told the Associated Press by satellite telephone from northern Iraq.

The spokesman for the rival KDP, Sami Abdurrahman, said his party had sought Iraq's help only after Iranian troops had moved into northern Iraq to help the PUK.

"Our rival has sided with Iran," Abdurrahman said at a news conference in northern Iraq. "Iranian troops had been attacking our positions."

Abdurrahman criticized the United States for failing to end PUK attacks against his fighters. The Kurdish safe haven in northern Iraq was carved out by the U.S.-led forces to protect the Kurds from Saddam's military after rebels mounted a failed rebellion against Baghdad in 1991.

old Austin Roodvoets of Inman. Both towns are about 40 miles northwest of Union.

Angela Phillips and White died trying to save those in the truck. Some bodies were found outside the truck, indicating that some children were pulled out, only to die before they could be brought to the surface, Wells said.

Vinson, who knew Angela Phillips, said it was especially hard for him to learn that children had again died in the lake.

"We had a hard time getting over Michael and Alex," he said.

News of the deaths spread quickly in the town of about 10,000 people, 55 miles northwest of Columbia. A steady stream of people came to the lake Sunday, some still in their church clothes.

"It seems like there's a curse on this lake," said Janet Addison of Union, a Phillips family friend.

On Oct. 25, 1994, Smith, distraught over a love affair, released the safety brake on her car and let it roll down a boat ramp with her sons still strapped inside in the back seat.

For nine days, she insisted that a black man had commandeered her car, and she begged tearfully on nationwide television for her sons' safe return. On Nov. 3, she confessed she had drowned the boys.

Smith was sentenced in July 1995 to life in prison. She will be eligible for parole in 2025.

Froggy, in turn, tells Betty Meeks, the lodge's owner, that the shy, reclusive Baker is a foreigner who speaks no English, thus removing his friend from any need to chit-chat.

The comedy proceeds as Baker releases himself from his restrictive social boundaries in his attempt to communicate with his fellow lodge residents without speaking.

The comedy also lies in the fact that Baker can understand every word around him while everyone keeps believing he's a foreigner.

One resident finds an attentive, speechless confidant in Baker. Catherine Simms, played by Jennifer Grace, senior in theater, is a southern belle in the strictest sense.

"She's kind of a brat. She's bored and restless," Grace said.

Another character, the villain of the story, is busy trying to get the hotel condemned. Rev. David Marshal Lee, played by Toby Denning, junior in theater, is a member of the Ku Klux Klan.

"He's smooth, but involved in shady stuff," Denning said.

Each character is somewhat self-serving, but in the end each helps to unleash Charlie's restricted nature while at the same time bettering himself.

"The end has a twist. There's a little romance in there," Maullar said.

function, would generate a third less pressure than that.

"The preliminary analysis indicates that if the center fuel tank was to explode on its own from an internal source, it would not do the kind of damage we have witnessed in Flight 800," an investigator familiar with the study, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the AP.

"This indicates that there must have been multiple things going on in addition to the fuel-tank explosion," the source said.

> • UNREVEALED SOURCE

One theory that investigators have been examining is that vapors in the nearly empty fuel tank could have become overheated and ignited, causing the tank to explode.

In a separate experiment, Boeing conducted a test flight in California's Mojave Desert last month with a 747 to determine if a fuel tank could become overheated and explode because of a spark.

The outdoor temperature was 71 degrees, about the same as it was on the evening of July 17, when Flight 800 exploded 11-1/2 minutes after takeoff, killing all 230 people aboard. Nineteen victims remain missing.

The approximate temperature in the test-flight fuel tank was measured at 115 degrees, sufficient to be ignited by an electrical spark. But there is no clue about what would have provided such a spark. The NTSB so far has not uncovered any plausible answers in the fuel or electrical systems.

The NTSB and Boeing spokesman Dough Webb did not comment on Monday.

few people use their cards at Streetside.

"I would imagine that people are using the cards more at Streetside than other places because they get a flat 10 percent off," Melin said.

"Me personally, I have rung up a couple people, so if you multiply that by everybody, I think a lot of people are using them," Melin said.

Chris Keffer, senior in management and Varney's Book Store employee, said she hasn't used her card yet, but she probably would at one of the beauty shops in Aggieville where she shops.

"I think as more people start using their card they will remind the person at that store, 'I've got one of those cards. Maybe I should be more conscious of where I shop and use my card, too,'" Sieben said.

Iraq to ignore limits

SPEED

After U.S. missile strikes, Saddam Hussein vows to shoot down any foreign aircraft and orders troops to ignore no-fly zones.

■ Kurds celebrate U.S. attack while Saddam threatens defiance.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A defiant Saddam Hussein vowed Tuesday to respond to U.S. missile strikes, ordering his troops to shoot down foreign aircraft and ignore the no-fly zones designed to keep his military in check.

Kurds in the north celebrated the attack launched by President Clinton, but said Saddam's forces were still pressing their offensive against Kurdish rebels.

Two American warships and a pair of B-52 bombers fired 27 cruise missiles at military targets in southern Iraq, killing five people, Iraqi and U.S. officials said

The attack set off air raid sirens in Baghdad and prompted Saddam to announce he would no longer honor the two no-fly zones that bar his warplanes from the skies of northern and southern Iraq.

"From now on, pay no attention to damned imaginary no-fly zones," Saddam told his armed forces. "Depend only on God, and hit hard and professionally at any flying target that belongs to the allied aggressors that penetrates the airspace of your beloved and glorious homeland.'

"Fight, resist these aggressors and teach them a new, unforgettable lesson about values that their empty souls lack."

During and since the 1990-91 Persian Gulf War, Saddam has often responded to punishing action by the West with dramatic threats of retaliation that were rarely carried out.

Clinton launched the strike Tuesday in response to Saddam's weekend assault on Kurdish rebels in Irbil, the main city in the Kurdish safe haven in northern Iraq.

Associated Press correspondent Yalman Onaran reported from Irbil Tuesday that the city was calm, but the boom of heavy artillery could be heard to the south.

Trucks loaded with fighters of the Iraqi-allied Kurdistan Democratic Party headed out of the city in long convoys, some heading toward the city of Sulaymaniyah, 100 miles to the southeast.

"We will attack Sulaymaniyah tonight, God willing," said one KDP fighter, who refused to give

Sexual predator remains jailed while challenging Kansas law

COLLEGIAN STAFF

A convicted sexual predator, who testified he has an uncontrollable urge to engage in sexual activity with children, is challenging Kansas' constitutional law.

Leroy Hendricks, who was convicted in Wichita, filed a lawsuit when the state attempted to lengthen his incarceration by activating the state's sexually violent predator statute, which allows the criminal to be incarcerated for an extended period of time under civil law.

Hendricks said he has served his time and needs to be released. The Kansas Supreme Court ruled that the statute violated the defendant's due process rights, which exist under the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

Hendricks and six other offenders will remain incarcerated during the debate. They were committed under the sexual predator act and may be released from the Larned Federal Prison if the Supreme Court finds the statute unconstitutional.

Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall will argue on behalf of the 1994 statute that permits the state to civilly commit those who have been convicted of, or charged with a violent sex crime, and who suffer from a mental abnormality or personality disorder that makes an individual likely to commit predatory sex crimes.

The Kansas v. Hendricks case should be decided by late November or early December, a spokesperson from Stovall's office said.

All four members of the Kansas House delegation, including Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Wichita, have signed a friend-of-the-court brief supporting Kansas' sexual predator statute.

"Society does have the right to protect innocent children," a spokesman for Tiahrt said.

Watermelon feed offers options to new students

DAVE KATZER
staff reporter

Opportunity, not just free watermelon, seemed to be the theme at the annual College of Agriculture watermelon feed on the front lawn of Waters Hall Tuesday night.

The feed, sponsored by the Agriculture Student Council and Alpha Zeta, an agriculture honorarium, allows new and transfer students the opportunity to interact with student leaders, faculty and campus organizations in the College of Agriculture.

"I see many senators, presidents and future business leaders as I look out across this group, but it's not going to happen if you don't take the initiative to get involved here at K-State," Agriculture Student Council president Jason Ellis, junior in agriculture journalism and animal science, said during his introduction speech.

> "I see many senators, presidents and future business leaders as I look out across this group, but it's not going to happen if you don't take the initiative to get involved . . .
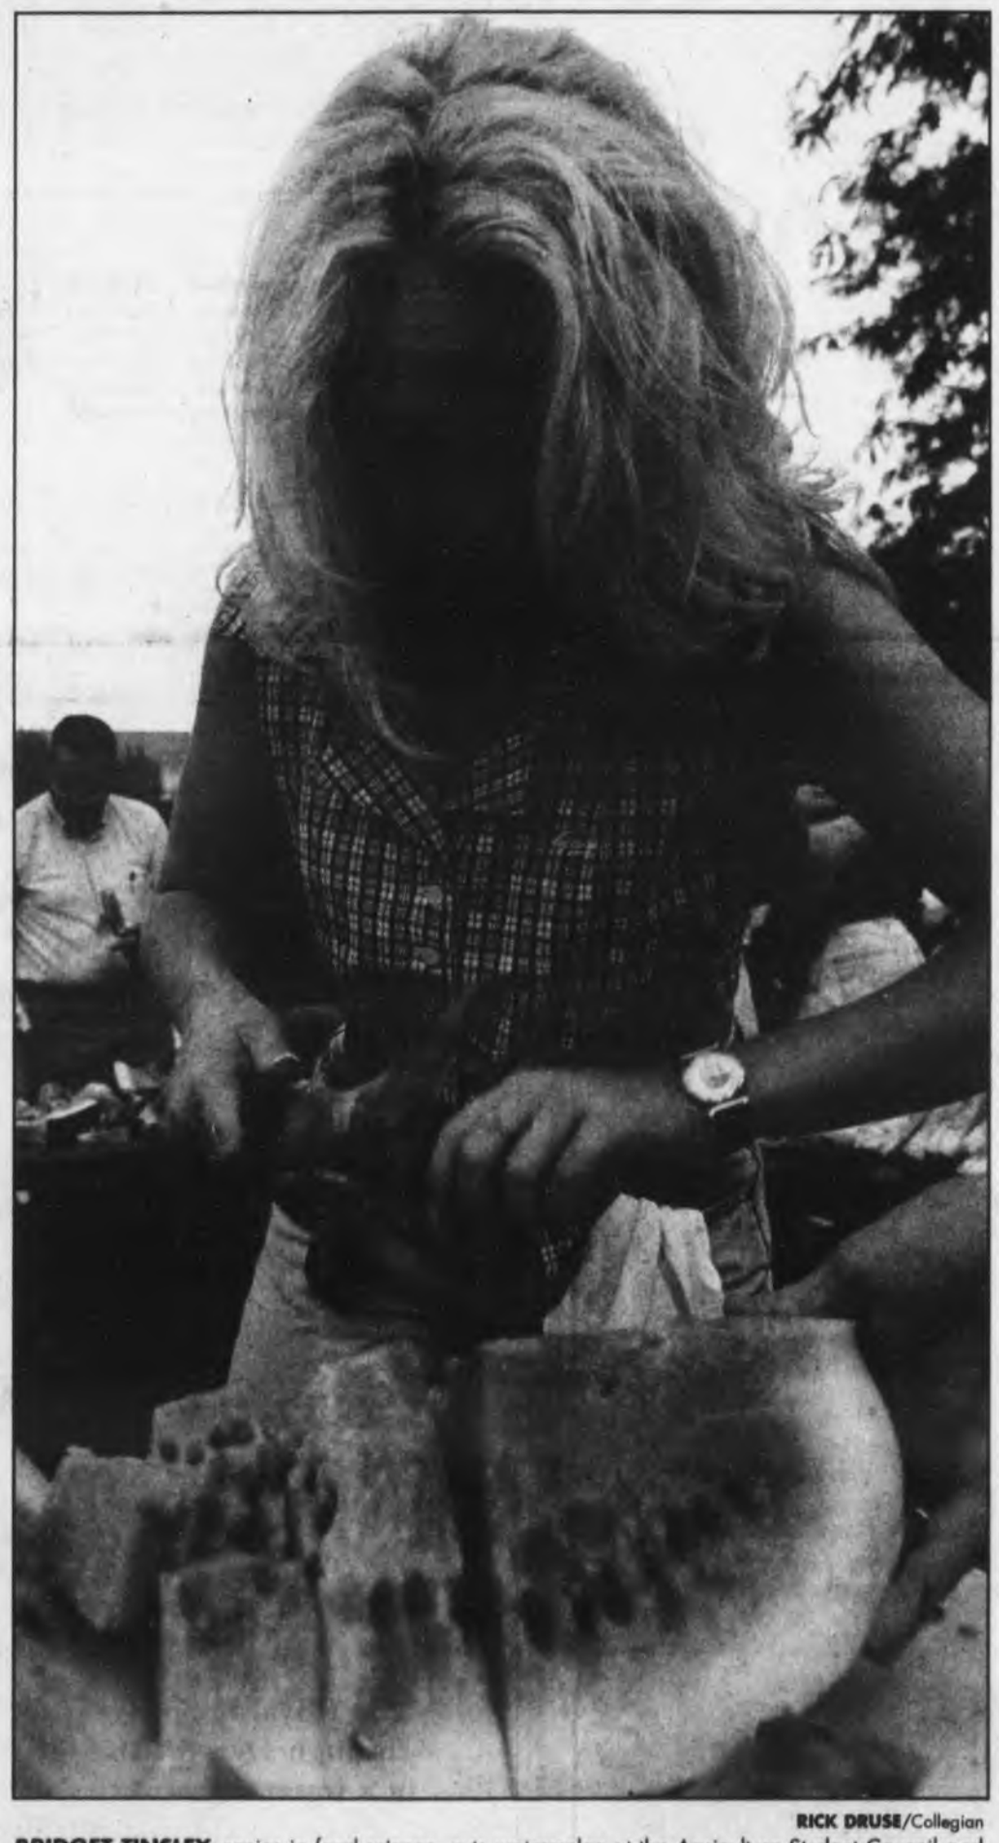
> ● JASON ELLIS
> JUNIOR IN AGRICULTURE JOURNALISM AND ANIMAL SCIENCE

It takes over three weeks to plan and 16 watermelon to put on the activity, according to Ellis. However, the opportunities the feed provides are more important to student futures at K-State than any watermelon.



"It's a good chance to orient students with the leadership opportunities available here through the College of Ag. The technical training we provide is essential, but we're concerned with developing the total person and their people skills," said David Mugler, associate director of academic program.

Each of the 26 student organizations was represented on the lawn at Waters, and all of the approximately 150 participants were encouraged to visit at least three groups.

New groups such as the Collegiate Cattlewomen are trying to form a club alongside other established organizations such as Block & Bridle and Rodeo Club. House plants, caps and shirts were given away as door prizes in addition to the watermelon.

"It's a really neat idea, and it gives new students the chance to see what kind of involvement is possible and helps the clubs recruit new members," Justin Lynn, junior in animal science, said.

Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture, gave the welcoming address to the group of students after the opening mixer.

County proposes 80-bed jail facility on K-State land

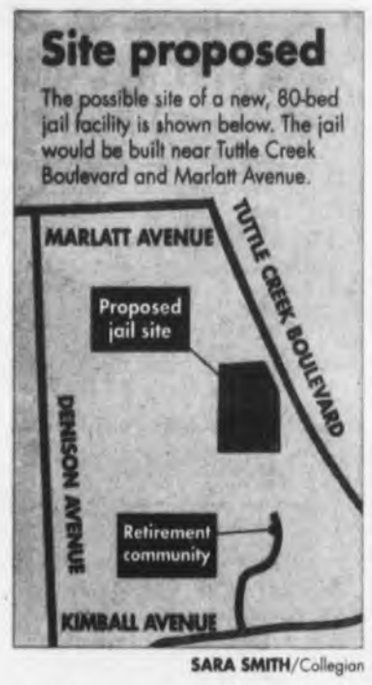
ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

The Riley County Police Department might build a new law-enforcement center on K-State property.

The area is just more than 15 acres on Tuttle Creek Boulevard near Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community.

The county is proposing to lease the area from the University for $1 per year and, in exchange, give the University certain benefits.

The two options, which were discussed Tuesday by the county commission, include giving K-State students health space at Mercy Health Center's Sunset Avenue and Claflin Road location and paving the rest of College Avenue north of Kimball Avenue.



The cost of the law-enforcement center is between $10 million and $13 million. Originally, the proposal would have cost $13 million, but county commissioners decided to try to lower the initial costs of the facility.

The county commission discussed how to pay for the law-enforcement facility and is considering putting a half-cent sales tax, lasting about seven years, on the ballots.

The commission hasn't decided whether to put the proposal on the general-election ballot in November or on the municipal-election ballot in April.

Bill Muir, director of community relations for K-State, said K-State offered the 15 acres because that area is not in use.

Muir added that even though the former Memorial Hospital is not up for sale or lease now, K-State has claimed the right of first refusal, meaning the University has the first option of acquiring that property, if it does go up for lease or sale.

SARA SMITH/Collegian

Lannie Zweimiller, director of student health, said even though formal discussions or plans haven't been made, the hospital's proximity to campus would be advantageous.

County commissioners began researching the possibility of building the facility over a year ago, shortly after the 1994 proposal for an expansion of the current Colorado Street location of the law-enforcement facility was voted down.

Larry Woodyard, assistant director of RCPD, said the previous proposal had a large opposition by residents near Sixth and Colorado streets.

Woodyard said this proposal shouldn't have the neighborhood opposition the previous one did.

The new facility would house both administrative offices and an 80-bed jail. RCPD is now housed in three separate locations, administrative and investigative divisions at 115 N. Fourth St., the jail at 600 Colorado St., and the patrol division at 610 Colorado St.

Woodyard said current locations of RCPD buildings make work difficult.

"We need to get back together so we can be efficient," he said.

Student, National Guard sergeant dies in high-speed weekend motorcycle crash

BREE BISHETTE
staff writer

A K-State student died in a motorcycle accident at 3:41 p.m. Sunday.

Clay Durbin, a 24-year-old junior in sports physical therapy, was the sole rider of the Kawasaki Ninja motorcycle.

The crash did not involve any other vehicles. Durbin was traveling north on Scenic Drive from Kansas Highway 18. The motorcycle struck a guardrail 1.1 miles north of K-18. Durbin was pronounced dead at the scene by the county coroner.

The details of the accident are still being investigated.

"There are no indications of why he left the road," said Allen Raynor, Riley County Police Department patrol captain. "However, we suspect excessive speed was involved."

Durbin's funeral will be at 11:30 a.m. Friday in the Dawson and Wikoff Funeral Home in Mount Zion, Ill., where Durbin used to live. Burial will be at Point Pleasant Cemetery in Long Creek, Ill., with full military rites.

Durbin was a sergeant with the 1st Platoon, Company B, 137th Infantry of the Kansas National Guard and was the team leader of the first squad at the time of his death.

Durbin was the son of Raymond and Ingrid Kopsch Durbin and had four brothers.

The Edwards-Yorgensen-Meloan Funeral Home is handling local arrangements. There are no on-campus services scheduled at this time, but memorials may be made to the Mount Zion Foundation for Quality Education, Box 31, Mount Zion, Ill., 62549.

▶ MOTORCYCLES

Area accidents prompt safety awareness

SETH GURSS
staff reporter

Two students have been killed and one has been critically injured while operating a motorcycle in Manhattan in the last six months. Because of this, safety has become more of an issue for motorcycle drivers.

Motorcycles can become dangerous if the operators are not protected. In the case of a crash, riders often will be thrown free at high rates of speed. This can lead to many different kinds of injuries, often fatal.

Authorities insist the only way to decrease the danger of motorcycles is to operate them safely.

Sgt. Stanley Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department said there are many ways for motorcyclists to be safe on the roads.

"First of all, they must obey all of the rules of the road, just like a car would," Conkwright said. Since motorcycles have many of the same capabilities of a car, they must follow the same rules on the road so everyone will remain safe.

He said the most important safety tip is that everyone should wear a helmet when operating a motorcycle. It is not a law in Kansas, but it can mean the difference between life and death.

If an accident occurs, a helmet is almost the only good form of protection available to cyclists. It is the only thing that can protect the head from being fatally injured in a crash.

Conkwright also said motorcyclists must make sure other drivers are able to see them on the road at all times. He said since motorcycles are smaller than cars, it is easier to lose sight of them. Because of this, it is important that cyclists have their headlights on at all times, always use hand and turn signals and always drive on the inside of their lane.

The most important thing to remember when operating a motorcycle is to use common sense. All the physical precaution in the world can be used, but none of them will matter if the driver is operating the motorcycle recklessly.

Fighting a blaze

A FIREFIGHTER, above, passes up an ax to another firefighter on the roof of the Dick Edwards Ford-Lincoln-Mercury Inc. paint room. Employees at the dealership noticed the fire when they saw smoke coming from the paint-room ventilator shaft. After the fire was put out, the firefighters chopped an opening into the shaft to make sure nothing was still burning. Richard Shermoen, business manager of the dealership, said the fire was caused by a mechanical malfunction in the shaft. The dealership has two paint rooms, and the older one, which is about 10 years old, is the one that caught fire. Left, firefighters from Riley and Pottawatomie counties regroup after dousing the fire. A paint room at the dealership caught fire and caused an estimated $150,000 in damage.

Course fees benefit students

DAN LEWERENZ
assistant campus editor

So fee payment is over, and you thought you were through.

But check your schedule. Depending on what classes you're taking, you might have a few more fees to pay.

In addition to the campus privilege fees every student pays, certain classes charge course fees for materials.

The most prolific user of course fees is the art department. More than a dozen classes, including sculpture, print, computer imaging and graphic design classes require extensive supplies.

"What we charge for are materials that the students use to make the artwork," said Anna Holcombe, head of the art department.

Fees for such materials usually take the place of textbooks in most classes and can run from $10 for photography to $147 for graduate-level ceramics.

The Kansas Board of Regents authorizes collection of such fees in the campus fee schedule.

According to the fee schedule, "An additional charge may be made to correspond with the actual costs of providing goods and services which are an integral part of presenting a course bearing academic credit, such as equipment and laboratory fees, media fees, testing fees, equipment rental, video/audio tapes, supplies and directly related items."

Holcombe said the department has the ability to purchase products in bulk that students might otherwise have trouble getting.

"The advantage to the student is that we're able to buy in bulk," she said. "For classes like ceramics and sculpture, they don't have to carry 25-pound bags of clay or plaster from the hardware store or the bookstore."

The disadvantage is that students do not always know they will be charged a fee. Holcombe said most fees are outlined in the course syllabus.

"Ideally the student would know about it beforehand," Marvin Burris, associate director of budget for the regents, said, "although I can imagine a situation where a student would not know about it before coming to class."

Art is not the only department that charges course fees. Hard sciences like biology and chemistry sometimes charge lab fees, and architectural engineering has fees for some drawing classes.

The art department has changed the way it collects fees, causing it to raise some fees as much as 10 to 20 percent. Holcombe said money from fees covers sales tax and part of the work-study wages for a student to help handle transactions for the accounts.

"For the most part, I think the students realize it's a positive for them," Holcombe said. "We occasionally get a disgruntled student, but we have such rare incidents of it because they understand we are usually saving them a lot of money."

Birthing facility saves money, limits choices

SCOTT CONNER
staff reporter

Manhattan will soon have its first consolidated hospital service since the town's two local hospitals combined to form Mercy Health Center last summer.

Beginning Monday, all obstetrical, newborn and gynecological services will be provided at Mercy Health Center's Sunset Avenue facility.

The 20-bed, 20-bassinet unit was redesigned and renovated last year before Memorial Hospital combined with the Saint Mary Hospital.

The unit includes birthing rooms that resemble home bedrooms, private showers and whirlpool baths.

A new room for Caesarean-section deliveries, recovery room and an expanded nurses' station were also included in the project.

Julie Davenport, Mercy Health Center's community relations director, said the major advantage of the consolidation was to save the hospital money by not duplicating services.

Davenport also said the only real disadvantage of consolidation was patients would lose their choice of hospitals.

Doreen Shanteau has been named director of the new unit.

She had served as unit manager of Memorial's obstetrical-gynecological unit since 1982.

"I am looking forward to the continued and improved quality care for people in Manhattan who are having babies," Shanteau said.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Extending sentences unconstitutional; law should change for future offenders

Seven men in jail for sexual misconduct with children are scheduled to be released from Larned Federal Prison soon.

These are men who admit they will offend again.

Knowing that, I'm sure most of us can agree that we don't want them back out on the streets.

WHY WE CARE

There's not much we can do about the seven men convicted of sex crimes who are about to be released from prison. But we are all responsible for changing the law for the future.

They have served their sentences, but they do not, however, appear to have modified their behavior.

Under the Sexual Predator Act, they can be committed civilly for a longer period of time, but the Supreme Court might strike down this ruling as being in violation of the 14th Amendment, which provides that everyone is guaranteed due process.

The fate of these seven men are out of our hands, but the fact that this debate exists points to a larger, highly complex problem in our society relative to the treatment of sex offenders.

Obviously, people who admit they will commit a crime need to be kept behind bars.

How can we do this without running the associated risks of violating their civil liberties?

Other governments, legally empowered to hand out indefinite sentences, have wrought untold human-rights violations.

Likely there are no black-and-white answers, but we cannot escape our responsibility to solve this issue.

The legislature is responsible to see that the sentencing rules for sex offenders keep criminals in jail until they are no longer criminals.

Our judges are responsible for commensurate sentencing.

Our law enforcement arm is responsible for keeping track of these people.

And we as a community are responsible for extending full aid to these officials.

So our children do not become victims, we need to educate them to stay away from strangers.

Neighborhoods need to be alerted when a sex offender moves nearby.

Does that infringe upon the sex offender's right to privacy? He has served his time and maybe he deserves to start his new life with a clean slate.

Indeed, we could all agree that the loss of a convicted sexual predator's privacy is a small price to pay to keep children out of harm's way.

These suggestions are just another way of saying that we, the people, are responsible.

This is a difficult issue to deal with because children in the United States are a very delicate commodity, as are the civil rights of its citizens.

We have to find a way to find a fair and just balance between the two or decide which one is more important.

You think you have roommate problems?

MY VIEW

Nikola Maria ZYTKOW

I can walk around my apartment naked, listen to Julio Iglesias, and burn incense. I can plaster my walls with the disturbing artwork of Salvador Dali, recite Edgar Allan Poe, or stay on the phone for hours at a time.

Such are the luxuries of living alone.

Yes, for the first time in four years of college I am roommate-free. This means I'm free to keep the place as dirty or clean as I want without offending anyone. It means spreading my textbooks all over the floor, opening up all of the windows, and letting the dishes pile up.

If I want company, my friends are a phone call away. If I want solitude, I simply unplug the phone and refuse to answer the door. Not that I do any of these things on a regular basis, but the point is I am free to do them.

Don't get me wrong. Having roommates can be a great social experience. I look back fondly on all of my ex-roomies. Let's see, there was the one who watched the Discovery Channel all day. One who listened to the Phantom of the Opera soundtrack at 3 a.m., kept green, moldy bread in the cupboards, and regularly ate all of my Beenie Weenies.

How about the one who wore out a part of our carpet with her 6 a.m. "Buns of Steel" workout. Oh, and how could I forget the roommate who suffered from every imaginable ailment? She couldn't dust because of allergies. She couldn't vacuum because of her back. And God forbid I touched the thermostat. (It had something to do with her sinuses).

> "One of my roommates slept with all of Fort Riley. Thank goodness we lived right by the health department."
> • PAM

Some people luck out, find the perfect roommate, and live happily ever after. But chances are if you go to school for a few years and switch roommates several times, you'll come across at least one, let's say, eccentric roommate.

Maybe you found her through an advertisement that said "desperately seeking roommate." Maybe because of similar majors you two were matched up by the residence-hall system. Or the worst case scenario — the best friend from high school. WARNING: This could turn ugly.

Here are some of the more intriguing roommate horror stories of fellow K-Staters I've compiled in the last week. The names have been changed to protect all parties involved. After hearing some of these stories, my own ex-roommates who complained that I got too many phone calls or my friends were too loud, don't seem so bad after all.

Check out some of these real-life nightmares:

• "My first roommate was little Polly Homemaker. She baked cakes all of the time. My second roommate (and best friend) slept with my boyfriend. It all started when the two of them would watch soap operas together while I was at work." — Samantha

• "One of my roommates slept with all of Fort Riley. Thank goodness we lived right by the health department." — Pam

• "She entered every beauty pageant possible. Starting at 3 a.m., she'd rehearse 'You Give Me Fever' very loudly." — Julie

• "My ex-roommate had a pet dog. Once he left town for three days and locked the dog in his room with a pile of dog food on the floor. God, did it stink." — Joe

• "He was a horticulture student and turned our apartment into a herbarium. We probably had over 50 types of plants in that place, not to mention all of the strange little critters that started crawling out of the ground." — Adam

• "I was living in the dorms. One night my roommate and his friend brought two, 15-year-old girls back to the room. I was deep asleep until the police started banging on the door and almost charged all of us with contributing to the delinquency of a minor. I had no idea what was going on." — Jeff

• "She was a total mooch. Everything that was mine became hers. She would actually hide my food from me. I started hiding my food in my closet, but somehow she found it. So I quit buying groceries. All I bought was pop tarts, and she managed to snuff those out, too." — Susan

• "When the rent was due, he mysteriously disappeared. I think he took off for Colorado. The guy was also a slob. He had dishes of mine underneath his bed with mold growing all over them." — Chuck

• "Our place became Motel 8 for just about every musician that came in town. She would let these guys stay overnight. They would tune their instruments while I tried to study." — Denise

• "He was my best friend from high school, so when he had some problems paying the rent, I said 'No problem, I'll help you out.' Then he had problems with the phone bill and the electricity bill. By the time the semester was over, he owed me around $2,000. One day, he skipped out without a word, dropped out of school, and left me with a huge long distance bill. (He had a girlfriend in Kansas City who he talked to three to four times a day.) The only thing he left behind was his truck, which I proceeded to sell to our next door neighbor to recover funds for the rent." — Louis

• "She brought a different guy home every night. Our walls were thin, and it was bang, bang, bang until the break of dawn. It was like a bad porno movie. In the morning, I had to nearly break down the door to get into the bathroom. They'd be in there giggling, taking long steamy showers. One of the guys put on my robe and asked me what I wanted for breakfast. That was the last straw." — Jennifer

• "I woke up to his hand stroking my chest. I brushed it off hoping, praying that it was all just a sick dream. But he put his hand right back on my chest and continued to massage me. I moved out the next morning." — Bob

• "It was a few years back in the dorms. I came back to the room to pick up a notebook I forgot for a class and found my roommate on the bed fingering the blade of a knife. He was saying 'I don't want to kill John, but I have to. He's a really nice guy, but he's gotta go.' Within the next 10 minutes I had some people in my hall move all of my stuff out of that place." — John

• "She was a nice girl, but she wasn't all there, socially. She would sit there and watch 'General Hospital' and 'One Life to Live' and talk to the characters. When I walked in the room, she ignored me." — Tammy

These stories are not meant to frighten. With some careful research, which should include a background check, a good roommate experience is possible.

After all, roommates can be a lot of fun. They can comfort you when you realize the guy you've been dating is a dog, hang out with you on a Saturday night when the bar scene starts getting old, or order pizza with you during a midnight study break. They can make sure you're up in time for a test. They can screen your calls and assure you that you look a lot thinner than you feel in your new Polyester pant suit.

Twisted morals

Dead celebrity exploited in Aggieville bar

Every Thursday night, a minority of students checks out of reality and into a bar, thus ushering in the weekend nightlife in Aggieville.

This continues through Saturday night — and into Sunday morning — and replays itself endlessly, weekend after weekend, year after year. It wouldn't be worth mentioning, if it weren't for the unsettling social problems it creates.

Most of the social aspects of bar life are tolerable. Can one blame young people for pursuing their desire to hook up with a new friend or lover? Can one blame students for wanting to escape, even for one night, the reality of life, classes and other demands?

It's not what these people are doing that's appalling. It's how they choose to do it and in what environment it is done.

Before I develop this idea, perhaps it should be said Aggieville is indeed a worthwhile diversion if not just for the shopping, bookstores and restaurants, but also for the variety of bars that do offer entertainment outside of the realm of picking up.

But, on occasion, these bars can augment, and even encourage, the kind of reckless behavior that usually ends up getting people arrested, creating lifelong habits, or at least making one evening very lousy and forgettable for two people.

Recently, I was dragged into that bar with the fishbowl dance floor and the so-so food — you know the place. Everything was going marginally. I sat at the table while my friends danced among beautiful people running around saying things like "Oh-my-God, you look so good, how was your summer, do you like my shoes? Cool!" Well, one doesn't go to bars for the conversation.

MY VIEW

Russell FORTMEYER

So, as an observer of life, I was looking around the place, eyeing the instamemorabilia and nostalgia so cleverly displayed, when on an electronic billboard five words flashed across in red, digital letters:

"Party till you River Phoenix!"

At first, I was confused. I didn't really understand the sentence structure — especially the gross misuse of a proper noun. Even the substitution of the word "till" for "until" makes the sentence a bit flaky, grammatically speaking.

Apparently, the staff of this establishment was encouraging its clientele to drink so much alcohol and consume so many drugs that they would end up writhing and sick on the sidewalk in front of the bar, dead.

That's exactly what happened so few years ago, at Los Angeles' Viper Room nightclub, to the young actor. That was Los Angeles; this is Manhattan — I guess it doesn't matter.

When I finally shook off my disbelief, all I wanted to do was leave. How could I be a party to this kind of logic?

Do I really think the owners wanted their clientele to die? Of course not. Why say it at all, though? You can't have it both ways. The bar staff can't deny its own actions yet encourage the outcome its actions would produce.

Hell, why not include Kurt Cobain, Jim Morrison, Dylan Thomas and Marilyn Monroe alongside Phoenix? Are there limits?

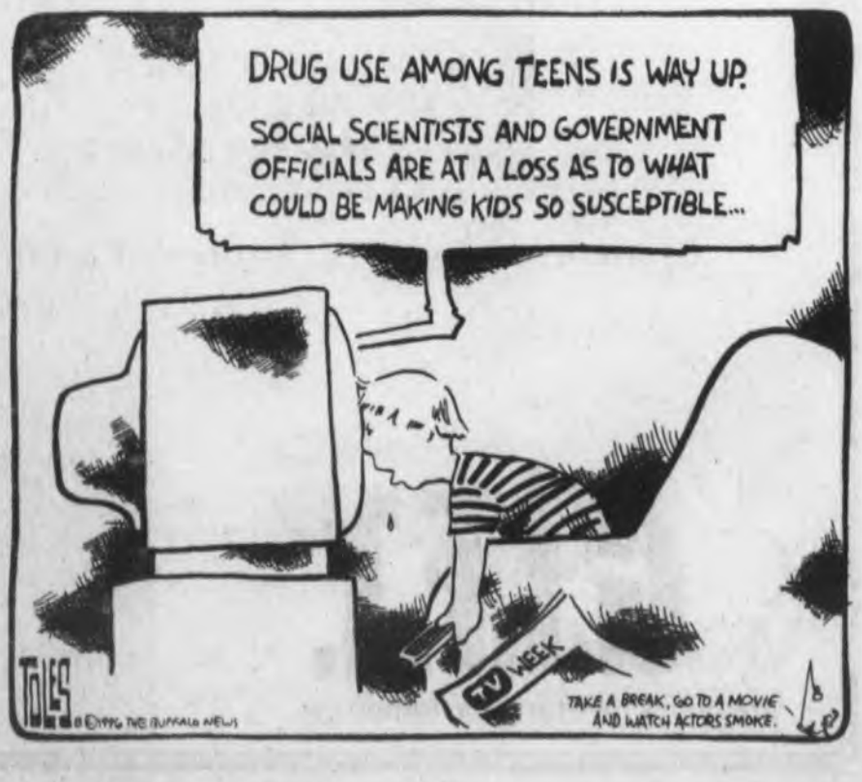
The fact the blasé crowd wasn't equally outraged can either be taken as they didn't notice, didn't care or thought it funny. Not much comes as a surprise to me. Like many people, I've been hardened and desensitized by television. But this was genuinely atrocious.

This attitude of excessive drinking and partying is not the sort of thing most parents consider worth plunking down a few thousand dollars a year to encourage. It's also not healthy.

What the shallow little sign did not take into consideration is Phoenix had a long bout with drug addiction. One cannot help but think the atmosphere of the L.A. club scene and party circuit influenced his behavior. The fact his friends were his cohorts in the scene did not help his case.

He's dead now. And although his few decent movies will remain in perpetuity, his chances of becoming a great actor and, perhaps, a Hollywood legend are nonexistent.

Unfortunately, none of the people who frequent that Aggieville bar are Hollywood celebrities who will be mourned nationwide upon their deaths. That night, none of the people in the bar had a shining array of screen appearances to their names that could live on when they were gone.



But this doesn't matter. We owe it to ourselves to refuse to live in this tasteless environment. We owe it to ourselves to seek out alternative means of entertainment that don't contribute to a national sickness of twisted morals.

Most of all, we don't deserve to be treated as the celebrity-obsessed, wasted youths this bar's message suggests.

Shuttle service to remain cost-free on school days

TARA WRAY
staff writer

Since its inception last November, University Shuttle Services has carried roughly 5,500 students to their destinations free of charge, and that doesn't look to be changing soon.

John Lambert, director of public safety, said as long as the shuttle remains in working order, students won't be charged to ride.

"I think that Parking Services can afford the shuttle for a short time," Lambert said. "As long as the bus hold up and doesn't break down, we'll be OK financially."

Lambert said it is a possibility that students would be charged if Parking Services is forced to replace the program's only shuttle.

Until then, the shuttle will continue to make roughly 19 trips per day, or two an hour, free of charge.

The shuttle's route begins at Edwards Hall at 7:45 a.m. From there it heads to the K-State Student Union, then to the KSU Foundation, and finally to the Forestry Building. Those are the only stops the bus makes.

"It's a good way to get around so you don't have to hassle with parking," Randy Kulp, library service facilitator, said. "And it's free."

Kulp said he has been riding the shuttle since last November about three times a week. He said he usually walks to campus but uses the shuttle to get to the KSU Foundation.

The shuttle does not carry students to and from classes. Instead it mostly carries students from outlying areas to the main campus.

"It mainly takes students from Jardine Terrace to the main campus," Lambert said.

The shuttle also provides gameday service to those not wanting to find parking.

"It goes to the various parking lots and picks up students and other people," Lambert said. "We had a lot of people riding this week."

There is a charge of 50 cents per person for the gameday service, and the shuttle can hold up to 15 people.

Campus shuttle takes new route

The campus shuttle service has expanded its schedule. The van will run on days classes are in session, making stops at the K-State Student Union, Edwards Hall, KSU Foundation Center and the motor pool/forestry department.

Fast aid available

ALISSA GOOD
staff reporter

Immediate financial aid is available to assist students who are waiting for financial aid, paychecks or other funds.

The K-State Emergency Student Loan program is available to all students as long as they have a source of repayment. Borrowing from the Emergency Student Loan fund is the same as borrowing from any other lender. It is a loan and must be repaid according to the signed agreement.

Loans will be granted only to students currently enrolled at K-State. An emergency loan cannot be issued to a student after the eighth week of classes. Loans are typically $200-400, and students will get the money in two to three days.

"Normally there is a 24-hour waiting period, but we extend that time during fee payment," Angie Velez, Emergency Student Loan cashier, said.

Several hundred students have applied for the emergency loan.

"More students are using the program because their financial aid is not in," Velez said.

Students may choose a repayment time of 30, 60 or 90 days, and there is a service charge on the loan.

"Many students take advantage of this program to buy books and help with living expenses," Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said.

The KSU Alumni Association and the KSU Foundation provide large, long-term student-loan programs. A student may not borrow BRIAN GOOLSBY, K-State fullback, tries to reach across the goal line during the first half of Saturday's game against Texas Tech. Goolsby did not score on the play.

Sycamores were 1st to fall

■ Five years ago, K-State had its first winning season in nine years. It started against the Sycamores of Indiana St.

TODD STEWART
sports writer

Five years ago it did not look so easy.

It was Sept. 7, 1991. K-State led Indiana State, 24-19, late in the fourth quarter. Indiana State had the ball and was driving, when Sycamores quarterback Ray Allen hit receiver Charles Swann for a 20-yard touchdown to pull the Sycamores ahead 25-24 with 3:24 left on the clock.

Indiana State decided to attempt a two-point conversion. It wanted to increase its lead to three and eliminate the possibility of losing on a Wildcat field goal. But Allen's pass attempt was intercepted by K-State's William Price and returned the other way for two points for the Cats. The play provided the final margin in the K-State 26-25 victory.

That season-opening victory helped propel the Cats to their first winning season in nine years.

Sycamores coach Dennis Raetz said his team will have to play near-flawless football for an Indiana State win in the rematch on Saturday.

"We have to play the very best we can in order to have a chance to win," Raetz said. "Obviously there are a lot of other teams I'd rather play than Kansas State."

Both teams will take the field on Saturday fresh off season-opening victories.

The Sycamores routed Mars Hill last week, 48-0. K-State is coming off a 21-14 victory against Texas Tech.

Raetz said the challenge for any NCAA I-AA team, and his team in particular, is it will not only have to play extremely well to win, but will have to play well even to keep the game close.

"Over the years, the biggest thing you have to do is play extremely well or you're going to be embarrassed," Raetz said.

Snyder said his team is also going to have to improve its season-opening play.

"We were fortunate to win the ballgame," Snyder said. "I think they're all correctable mistakes, and that's what we're working on right now."

He said playing NCAA I-AA Indiana State changes game preparation little for the Cats.

"You're trying to correct mistakes. This would be no different for us no matter who we might be playing," Snyder said.

Quarterback Brian Kavanagh said mistakes were numerous last week against Texas Tech, but it was the Cats' ability to come together as a team that helped the team prevail.

"Thank God it's a team. Whatever they were doing was very effective," Kavanagh said.

In that game, K-State was outgained by 232 yards in total offense, and allowed 17 more first downs.

Snyder said Texas Tech's blitz, which caused problems for K-State throughout the game, exposed a weakness in the Cats, and he expects to see it again.

"We need to re-prepare for some of the things Texas Tech did. We'll see it again," Snyder said. "I think Indiana State will certainly look at that."

Snyder said, however, there is no way his team can afford to look past the Sycamores, especially after the struggles against Texas Tech.

"It's so easy to take things for granted," Snyder said. "That's something we want to be extremely cautious about."

Collins leaves, Gramatica's hurt, Rheem plays, Romano backs up

■ The Wildcat kicking squad has been scrambling to make changes.

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

When K-State takes the field Saturday night, it will see a familiar face in Scott Collins. But Collins will be standing on the sidelines of Indiana State, not K-State.

Collins transferred from K-State to Indiana State this past summer and is immediately eligible to play.

"Scott was the No. 2 kicker here," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He didn't feel he had an opportunity to kick here.

"He wasn't upset with anyone here. He just wanted the opportunity to see some playing time."

Collins saw action in Indiana State's first game against Mars Hill. He got off three punts, averaging 39.7 yards a punt.

With the departure of Collins and a knee injury to Martin Gramatica, the kicking duties are left to true freshman Jamie Rheem.

Following his first career start last week against Texas Tech, Rheem said he was surprised to find out he would be playing this season.

"All through the summer, I thought I would be redshirted," Rheem said. "When I saw Martin go down, I knew it was bad. Right then, my heart started pumping really fast, and I started to think about that first game."

Against the Red Raiders, Rheem made the most of his opportunity, connecting on all three of his extra-point attempts.

His career-long field goal at Wichita Collegiate High School was 47 yards. Rheem did say that he has hit from 60 and 65 yards in practice.

After his senior season, Rheem said he turned down scholarship offers from both Kansas and Missouri.

"I just really liked K-State better," Rheem said. "I really liked the coaches here. They seemed more involved in recruiting me."

Although Rheem is a true freshman, Snyder said he is confident in Rheem's ability.

"Jamie Rheem will do fine out there," Snyder said. "He is going to be a good kicker for our program."

Snyder also said that Chad Romano will be the No. 2 kicker behind Rheem.

Although he has yet to attempt a field goal in a collegiate game, Rheem said he is not nervous about the chance.

"When you get the opportunity, you have to put everything behind you and take it," Rheem said.

"I'm just looking forward to my chance to get out there and show people what I can do."

Overtime only 1 change to NCAA football

TODD STEWART

What if Texas Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge had led the Red Raiders on a game-tying drive in the final minute of play against K-State?

Introducing college football's tie-breaker.

Each team would have been given a first-and-10 at the 25-yard line, and the winner would have been the first team to score while stopping the other team from doing the same.

> "More coaches wanted to break ties than didn't. Just those who wanted to break ties were split on how to do it."
> • GREG SUMMERS
> FOOTBALL RULES COMMITTEE

Greg Summers, NCAA staff liaison to the football rules committee, said coaches have long wanted to find a solution to tie ballgames.

"In our past surveys, more coaches wanted to break ties than didn't," Summers said. "Just those who wanted to break ties were split on how to do it."

Summers said some coaches favored an NFL-type overtime system, but more recently coaches have chosen the first-and-10 at the 25.

"Coaches now overwhelmingly support it," Summers said.

The tie-breaker had been in the NCAA rulebook since 1973, Summers said, but was only for use in games determining advancement in tournaments or in championship games. Thus, with its current bowl system, Division I-A was left out.

There are also a few more changes to the rulebook, one being a clarification in the intentional-grounding rule.

A receiver must now have a reasonable chance to catch the ball, instead of just being in the area.

"Basically what this does is eliminate the pass at the sideline, 30 yards over the receiver," Summer said.

This season the ball will also be ruled dead if a runner's helmet is knocked off, instead of allowing the play to finish on its own.

On special teams, a long snapper cannot be directly run into for one second after the snap. This gives him a chance to be set for the on-coming rush and eliminate dangerous blows while the head is down.

The last new rule is a penalty for players with illegal cleats.

If a player is found with spikes longer than the allowed two inches, he will be suspended for the rest of that game and the entire next game.

"Basically, we've found that longer spikes create a huge advantage," Summers said.

"If they're wearing them, we have to find them before it's too late and the game's decided."

Hate to lose? Learn a lesson from Smith, work harder

I hate to lose. OK, not as much as Tom Osborne hates to lose. I would never have a win-at-all-costs mentality, resorting to allowing girlfriend-beaters to play on my team.

I play pool. I play a lot of pool. Just ask those guys at Scoreboard or in the Outback at Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. I'll take anyone on, anywhere, anytime. I began playing pool after my boyfriend and I got into a fight because I was bored watching him play pool. I started talking to the people around me. Typically, the types of people around a pool table are male, so he became jealous.

I decided I was tired of being what I call a pool-widow. Eventually, I learned to play so that my boyfriend and I could spend some quality time together. That was yet another mistake. (Dating him was the first.) We were both so competitive. I refused to lose to him, and he to me. We ended up fighting more than ever. Needless to say, that relationship died rather soon after that.

MY

Shana NEWELL

But my hatred of losing lives on. I'll never change.

It's why I get so upset when the Dallas Cowboys lose. My roommates can attest to that. One of my roommates is a Chicago Bears fan. I think he delighted in the Cowboys' loss.

About halftime, I started screening my phone calls. Too many of my friends would try to call to spout smart-aleck comments. David McIntyre — I know what you had planned. Shame on you.

With three minutes remaining in the game, I went sulking to my room.

I guess that's why I admire Emmitt Smith as much as I do. For those of you who missed Monday night's NFL blowout, you would have seen prime examples of why I respect the man.

I hope you were paying attention. The Cowboys' offense wasn't on the field very often, leaving little time to witness the miracle that is Emmitt. It actually reminded me somewhat of Saturday's K-State vs. Texas Tech game. The offense was sloppy. It downright sucked.

And still Emmitt worked. He gave 150 percent, if not more, every time he had the ball. And when he did not have the ball? He worked even harder. He knew someone else was counting on him to make the key blocks. He knew if he didn't the Cowboys would lose.

And like me, Emmitt hates to lose.

I left the room with three minutes left in the game. I left after Emmitt Smith was carted off the field. The one person who was sincerely trying to win, wasn't even on the field. I didn't want to watch anymore. I hate to lose. I hate it even more when I'm watching my team lose without trying not to lose.

For those who didn't see, Emmitt was injured on a play-action fake at about the one-yard line. Quarterback Troy Aikman faked a hand-off to Emmitt who then climbed a pile of players as if he were going to dive for the endzone.

Instead of landing on a cushion of players, the ground was waiting for Smith, and he hit it hard. He lay on the ground until a gurney was called for him, delaying the game for nearly 10 minutes.

I watched one more play following his injury and saw that Aikman and the rest of the Blue Crew could not take Emmitt's injury and turn it into a positive, a touchdown. They couldn't take his must-win attitude and use it for their benefit.

Emmitt deserves more, much more. He deserves to win.

But winning on the gridiron isn't as important to Emmitt as winning in life.

In this last off-season, Smith returned to the University of Florida to obtain his college diploma in public recreation, fulfilling a promise he had made to his mother when he joined the professional ranks of the football league.

Emmitt realizes one day he won't be winning on the football field anymore. But that doesn't mean he has to lose off the field.

Team to begin practice with two new players

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

The Wildcat tennis program will begin practice Friday with two new members, Aisha Butt and Anna Pampoulova.

Butt, a freshman from Clay Center, will be eligible to play this year, while Pampoulova will sit out the 1996-97 season for academic reasons.

"Aisha is the fourth player from Kansas we've signed in the last four years," Coach Steve Bietau said. "She has a similar, maybe somewhat stronger background than some of the other players from Kansas. She'll be competitive, but she won't be playing for No. 1 yet."

All-American Karina Kuregian, who helped lead the Cats to the NCAA tournament last season, was the only senior on last year's team. She will remain at K-State to complete her degree.

Yasmine Osborn, a freshman on last year's squad, transferred to Northwest Missouri State, an NCAA Division II school, where she will be eligible to play immediately.

▶ CITY COMMISSION

Funding to create local jobs

MIKE O'LEARY
staff reporter

The Manhattan City Commission made use of sales-tax receipts from the economic-development fund to create 19 jobs.

The commission approved a Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board proposal for the expenditure of $165,000 in funding for ASHA Distributing of Kansas City.

ASHA is a wholesale distributor of heating, venting and air-conditioning equipment. It plans to move its wholesale distribution functions and telemarketing activities to Manhattan.

This will create 19 jobs in Manhattan in the next two years.

The jobs created will not be minimum-wage but will begin at a competitive level with other markets.

"We do not have a current employee that makes less than $8 per hour," Trace Smith of ASHA said.

This wage scale fulfills the city commissioners' wish that the economic-development fund be used to create jobs above the minimum-wage level.

The commission set an Oct. 1 date for the public hearing on ASHA's request for a 10-year property-tax abatement.

The commission also approved a special-projects grant of $100,000 from the economic-development fund for KanGolf Inc., contingent on approval of a pending Small Business Administration loan application.

This is to assist in phase II expansion of the existing facilities in the Anneberg Park area.

Phase I included the sand volleyball courts, batting cages and other recreation facilities.

Phase II involves the construction of a nine-hole, par-30 golf course on the remaining 41 acres of the development. The golf course is intended to accommodate the overflow from and act as a complementary course to the Stagg Hill Golf Course.

The commission also approved the allocation of funds from the Special Alcohol Fund for youth programs and considered an offer from Julie Strecker for the purchase of property in Industrial Park.

Center aspires to replace steel with ceramic

JEREMY KELLEY
staff writer

Ceramics. It might stimulate thoughts of cute, little piggy-bank of all of us broke into as youngsters or maybe bring to mind a funny-looking vase created by a preschool student; but, at K-State, at the Abrasive Micro-Machining Center, ceramic material is being processed into engine and automobile parts.

"We are trying to develop a new technology where better accuracy in the grinding process leads to less expensive machining," Ioan Marinescu, director of the Abrasive Micro-Machining Center at K-State, said.

Six months ago Marinescu, who has been involved with the process of grinding ceramics for more than three years, came to K-State from the University of Connecticut along with some of his graduate students to establish a center at K-State.

"We are involved in five ceramic-related projects right now," Marinescu said. "These projects will help us transfer the technology of grinding ceramics into durable parts from the University to the industry."

The center is currently involved with a project using a process called lapping, which is a very fine finishing process. The project will produce a way to obtain the best-quality surface for ceramics. Marinescu said by using this process, objects can be grounded down as small as five nanometers. (one nanometer = one billionth of a meter)

> "(Ceramics) is a material which the United States has invested a lot of money in."
> • IOAN MARINESCU
> DIRECTOR OF THE ABRASIVE MICRO-MACHINING CENTER

"This process could smooth a ceramic seal for a perfect fit in an engine," Marinescu said. "A seal like this would give a complete fit, as well as be stronger than rubber, brass or steel."

A process like this would be easier and more proficient rather than having to make a seal out of steel or some other metal. Ceramics are much smaller and lighter than steel, easier to work with under high temperatures, and inexpensive.

"Another project we are doing involves the use of a laser which is put in front of the grinding wheel," Marinescu said. "This process, a process proposed and invented by me, increases the productivity process by twenty-five times."

Marinescu said by simply sticking a laser in front of the grinding wheel before the ceramic gets broken up, the grinding process is a lot quicker and easier.

Marinescu said manufacturing engineers in the United States started looking seriously at ceramic parts about 15 years ago. He said the mission of the center at K-State is to replace steel parts with ceramic parts because of the durability and longevity that ceramic parts have.

"Ceramic parts are much smaller and lighter than steel. It is a material which the United States has invested a lot of money in," Marinescu said. "For example, the Navy is looking for ways to make ceramic valves for ship engines. These ceramic valves would last longer and cost a lot less."

Ceramic parts are becoming very popular, not only for automobile and engine parts, but also in many other areas of industry.

"Ceramics can be used for application in aerospace such as hybrid bearings, seals for the chemical industry, and in jet and helicopter engines," Marinescu said.

K-State vets study fatal equine illness

JACQUELINE BONE
staff reporter

Equine protozoal myeloencephalitis is a potentially fatal disease affecting horses that has recently gained researchers' attention.

The Veterinary Medicine Complex sees one to three cases of EPM a month, said Dr. Julia Flaminio, veterinarian and resident of equine internal medicine at K-State.

EPM is a neurological disease. Symptoms may include rear-limb weakness, muscle atrophy (wasting away), incoordination and seizures. This disease can be fatal if not treated.

Flaminio said the consequences of the disease, not the organism itself, are what causes death. Most commonly the horse is euthanized because EPM's symptoms hinder its movement.

> "There is a 60-percent chance for recovery to full performance with early therapy."
> • JULIA FLAMINIO
> K-STATE VETERINARIAN

The disease does not limit itself to any particular breed, sex or age of horse. Flaminio said EPM can even infect other species of animals, including dogs, llamas and cats. EPM has been noted in all areas of the United States, with the highest concentrations in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Florida.

The disease was first described in 1964, but the culprit of the problem was not identified until 1991. The protozoan that causes the disease is called Sarcocystis falcatula.

The organism must go through a complicated life cycle before infecting a horse. The horse is a dead-end host. This means the horse is the last host the organism enters.

The organism begins its life cycle in the muscle of an infected bird, such as a cowbird or grackle. The bird contracts the disease by eating food infected by opossum feces. The bird is eaten by an opossum or other small predator. The protozoan goes through its sexual phase in the intestinal tract of the opossum, Flaminio said.

Flaminio said the horse ingests the organism by eating grain, hay or even pasture grasses contaminated by infected opossum feces.

The opossum is not bothered by the protozoan hitchhiker it harbors, Flaminio said. The length of time the protozoan can live in hay or other food is unknown.

EPM exposure can be tested by blood sampling. Fifty to 70 percent of North American horses have been exposed to EPM, according to an update on EPM by Dr. Bonnie Moore, a K-State veterinarian. However, Moore said horses that test positive from blood samples may never exhibit symptoms.

Spinal fluid is drawn to positively diagnose infection, Flaminio said. Horses that test positive for EPM should begin treatment immediately.

"There is a 60-percent chance for recovery to full performance with early therapy," Flaminio said.

Flaminio said EPM can be treated by orally administering a combination of anti-protozoan and antibiotic medications. This drug therapy does not kill the protozoan but inhibits replication of more bugs. The horse will be on drug therapy for about three months.

The horse is also given folic-acid supplements to reduce the risk of anemia, Flaminio said.

EPM relapse is possible. According to Moore's update, relapse occurs 10-15 percent of the time. The signs of relapse are identical to those exhibited previously, Moore said.

'Tin Cup:' a masterpiece of golf humor

GREG MCLEAN
contributing writer

Kevin Costner grips it and rips it in his new movie "Tin Cup."

Costner rebounds from the action adventure movie blunder "Waterworld."

Costner plays Roy "Tin Cup" McAvoy who returns to the kind of comedy that so engaged audiences in "Bull Durham" and "The Bodyguard."

His character is an egotistical golfer that could never make it on the professional golf tour because of his attitude. He ends up at a driving range in the Texas desert where he is a golf pro working for his next six pack.

"Tin Cup" also stars Renee Russo as Dr. Molly Griswold, who is a psychologist that tries to help Costner with the mental aspects of golf.

Don Johnson as David Simms, basically plays himself in this movie — a golfer who plays to the camera, but behind the scenes is a womanizing bastard who hates old people, children and dogs.

Chhech Marin as Romeo Marin is Costner's caddy. He is not as funny as I expected, but he still brought life and humor to the movie"Tin Cup" is a masterpiece of humor, golf and romance. What else is there in life?

▶ On a four-star rating system this movie is a four.

This would be a great date movie or movie for the guys to go see, if you're into that kind of thing.

There are a couple of lull moments during the flick, but they are short, and it gives you time to regroup and enjoy the movie.

Costner pulls off the golf swing, which is hard to fake. Not many actors could have pulled that off.

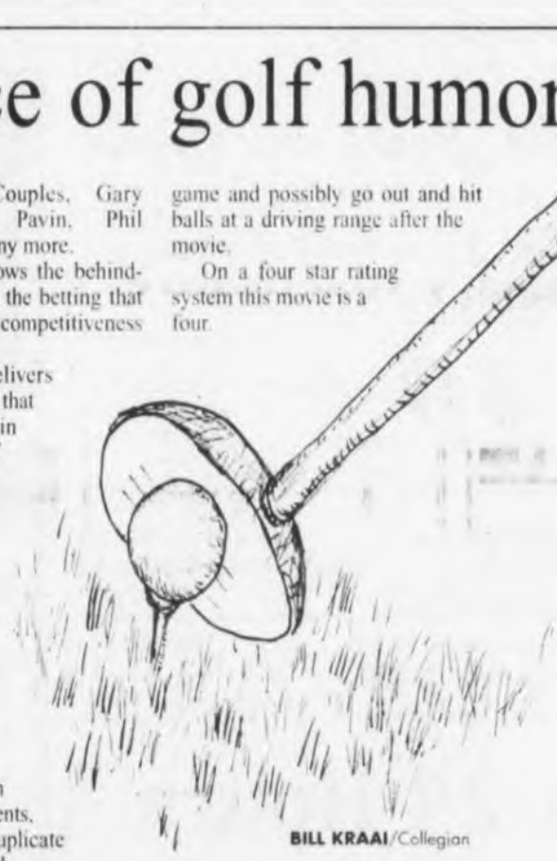
Russo is as sexy as she is good at acting. Definitely a 10 on the swing scale.

"Tin Cup" has cameos from almost every famous golfer on the professional tour. These golfers include Fred Couples, Gary Mccord, Cory Pavin, Phil Mickelson and many more.

This movie shows the behind-the-scenes of golf, the betting that goes on, and the competitiveness of the profession.

Costner delivers some pick-up lines that may be useful in Aggieville, if you're into that sort of thing.

For example, Costner asked Russo, "Tell me you're not at least moderately attracted to me?"



"You have your moments," Russo replied.

"Tell me which ones are my moments, and I'll try to duplicate them," Costner said.

If you enjoy golf like I do, you will enjoy this movie.

If you don't enjoy golf, I will almost bet you will appreciate the game and possibly go out and hit balls at a driving range after the movie.

On a four star rating system this movie is a four.

Perspective adds originality to art

▶ "A Personal Geometry," an exhibit of acrylic on canvas by a former K-State instructor, is on display in Willard Gallery through Sept. 13.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

As colorful and as seemingly simple as a summer day, Martha Horvay's art gives the Willard Gallery a needed splash of light.

Horvay's art is on exhibition in the show "A Personal Geometry," which runs in the Willard Gallery until Sept. 13. Horvay is an associate professor of art at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, but she served a stint as a temporary instructor of art at K-State in 1982-83.

Although her paintings may first appear quite simple, one hesitates to label them accordingly since they refer, directly and indirectly, to any number of things.

Horvay's works in this show, all acrylics on canvas made since 1989, are similarly constructed paintings of objects or combinations of objects — either buildings, mechanical or other equipment, or various geometrical oddities all viewed from an angled, overhead perspective. Each is filled with pattern, creating a rhythmic play that both draws attention to the objects and helps to reinforce a strong feeling of three-dimensionality rarely fully expressed in a work of art.

This use of pattern wouldn't be overly compelling were it not for the liberal use of color.

"The liveliness comes more from the interaction of colors," Horvay said. "The way they play off each other appears to increase the intensity."

This presumed increased intensity of color only heightens the profile of the objects.

In this, Horvay has reconstructed still life to the point where the object as subject matter is blatantly confrontational.

The viewer is pulled by the collar and slapped around as if one had to acknowledge this or leave. These paintings are no candlesticks and bowls of fruit, but they do fit in that genre.

An architect would surely see some of the paintings as studies of spatial relationships, especially because Horvay includes in her creative process a step in which she carefully constructs the objects in exact mechanical drawings — much like an industrial designer would.

This is most noticeable in a work such as "Rialto," acrylic on canvas, 1995, which appears as a grouping of buildings laid out along a nondescript landscape.

This architectural quality comes as no surprise when you consider Horvay's early experience was with a bachelor of science degree in design, particularly industrial design, at the University of Michigan.

"I learned a lot about perspective as an undergraduate," Horvay said. "There is nothing about it that is real — it's all a contrivance."

"I use a perspective that is in a lot of military instruction guides," she said. "I'm looking for a certain kind of awkwardness that will make the objects lively."

This perspective awkwardness, which mainly stays the same in each painting, is definitely not lost on the viewer as one's perception of the perspective changes with each painting. Some works appear to be collages protruding from the canvas, while others will appear to be aerial views of landscapes — yet, perspectively, nothing has really changed.

Horvay admits to this perspective perception game. She said, "I'm very interested in how we perceive depth and how to tease that perception."

Horvay's original inspiration for her still-lifes was from ethnic canned food, which had colorful, geometric labels, she saw when she lived in New York City. The inspiration for the red-and-white stripe pattern found in many of the works came from 19th century brick-laying patterns.

However, there has been no inspiration to include any humans in her work.

"What I'm painting is very pessimistic," Horvay said. "What you see seems very worn-out."

States opt to eliminate primaries to save funds

SARAH LUNDAY
senior staff writer

This year's national presidential primaries may be long over, but they are not forgotten.

The nation's secretaries of state have proposed a change in the current nomination process to the Republican and Democratic parties.

About a dozen states, including Kansas, opted to save money by not bothering to have primaries this year. This attitude, and a growing number of citizens who told their elected officials their state's primaries don't make a difference, has motivated a change in the way some states want U.S. presidents elected.

"The current presidential-election process has a number of problems, the biggest one being a majority of Americans are feeling left out," Kansas Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh said.

> "Bob Dole locked down the nomination within 17 days of the Iowa primaries."
> — RON THORNBURGH, KANSAS SECRETARY OF STATE

The current process, which begins in February, has each state's primary occurring about two weeks after the previous state. States such as New Hampshire, which have primaries in February, usually set the tone for the races.

In the 1996 election, states were playing leap-frog with each other, Thornburgh said. California, Texas and other states moved their primaries up.

"Bob Dole locked down the nomination within 17 days of the Iowa primaries," Thornburgh said.

If Dole did actually have the Republican nomination in hand by early March, all states who had primaries after mid-March were irrelevant to the primary-election process.

New Hampshire Secretary of State William Gardner said no matter how the primaries were organized this year, Dole and President Clinton probably would have been selected as the contenders in the 1996 elections.

But the system does need to change, said Gardner, who co-authored the National Association of Secretaries of State resolution proposed to both parties.

The current primary system motivates all states to move their primaries up — eventually leading to a one-day national primary — which is referred to in political circles as compression.

Campaigns like those of President Lincoln, who took months to give motivational speeches in a variety of states, or President Carter, who advertised by traveling without a large campaign budget, would not be possible if the current leap-frog primary system continues, Gardner said.

"Picture yourself in a state having the primary or caucus in June this year. Then the nomination is basically decided," Gardner said.

A task force, including secretaries of states from 12 states, has offered the parties two alternatives to the current system to think about.

First, primaries could adopt a regional primary system. This system would include dividing the country up into six or eight regions in which candidates could campaign. Ideally, this would give candidates an average of two months to spend in an area. The second proposal is called the back-weighted system, which provides incentives for states to have their primaries at the end of the year, rather than closer to February. The current system is often referred to as front-loading.

"With this front-loading, a half a dozen states get to participate in the process, and the rest of us just signed off," Thornburgh said.

IRAQ

KDP fighter, who refused to give his name.

In addition to the strikes, Clinton also declared that the southern no-fly zone would be moved up from the 32nd to the 33rd parallel — a line that reaches the southern suburbs of Baghdad and places roughly half of Iraq inside the zones.

Saddam claimed Iraqi forces shot down most of the incoming missiles, a claim disputed by American officials. In Washington, Gen. Joseph Ralston said there was no evidence of successful Iraqi counterattacks.

Oil prices continued climbing Tuesday in response to the attack.

Iraq's deputy prime minister insisted the American attack was unjustified, saying Saddam's forces had withdrawn from Irbil several hours before the missile strikes. He also derided U.S. claims that Saddam had violated U.N. resolution 688, which prohibits the Iraqi leader from oppressing his people.

"We did not violate U.N. resolutions," Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz said on CNN. "I challenge the American administration (to say) upon what basis of international law ... this aggression was being justified."

But U.S. and rebel officials said Iraqi forces had not withdrawn from Irbil before the attack and fighting continued south and east toward Sulaymaniyah.

Iraq's ruling Revolution Command Council urged the other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council to rein in the United States — and seemed to threaten them if they did not.

"(Iraq) has adopted several necessary decisions and measures to confront the situation in the light of the cowardly American aggression," the Iraqi council said in a statement carried by the state-run Iraqi News Agency.

The United States and Britain were having trouble gathering support in the Security Council for a resolution condemning Iraq; France and Russia, two other permanent council members, opposed the measure.

The council did approve a routine renewal of the sanctions against Iraq, as expected.

Russia condemned the bombing, which it said could send events in the region spiraling out of control. China urged both sides to show restraint, while Britain said the United States was right to attack after Saddam's army moved north into Kurdish rebel areas with 45,000 soldiers and 300 tanks.

British Prime Minister John Major said the U.S. attacks were designed to prevent a recurrence of the humanitarian trage after the Persian Gulf War in 1991 when Saddam's forces killed large numbers of Kurds.

"He has a human rights record in Iraq that is absolutely atrocious," Major said.

While Saddam said the U.S. assault caused very light damage, U.S. officials said surface-to-air missile sites and radar installations were struck near the Tallil air base in southwestern Iraq, the Euphrates River city of Nasiriyah and al-Iskandiariyah and al-Kut.

In Baghdad, a city of 4 million people, sirens sounded at 9:25 a.m. but Iraqis, hardened by two recent wars and economic and social hardships, appeared unshaken.

Pedestrians and motorists filled the streets during the rush hour.

The anti-Saddam Patriotic Union of Kurdistan supported Washington's claims that Iraqi forces were continuing their assault on the region before and after the missile strikes.

The rebel group said the Iraqi military, after evicting anti-Baghdad activists from Irbil, withdrew and regrouped for an attack on towns to the east.

Some 100 miles south, the Iraqis were pounding the town of Chemchemal, which is just outside Sulaymaniyah, the rebels claimed.

The U.S.-led air force protecting Iraqi Kurds pulled its military coordination center out of northern Iraq early Tuesday before the air strikes, moving 21 American, Turkish and allied soldiers from Zakho to the Turkish border town of Silopi.

"In view of the heightened tension, they thought it was becoming unsafe to stay there," said U.S. Air Force Capt. Michael Shavers, a spokesman at Incirlik Air Base in southern Turkey.

JAIL

Woodyard said the building at 610 Colorado St. was intended to be the garage of a larger building that was never built. He said the patrol division has been using the garage as office space since 1974.

Woodyard said the jail at 600 Colorado St. speaks for itself, adding that it was made for 19 inmates but has a daily average of 35.

He said the jail has no separation for different types of inmates. Pre-trial and convicted men are housed together. Serious and less-serious offenders are also often housed together.

Although it hasn't happened in Manhattan, Woodyard said many lawsuits have been filed across the nation based on crowded housing of inmates.

Another problem with the jail is that it is has no facility to house women. Woodyard said this means more time, and therefore more money is spent on taking women to facilities in Junction City.

Woodyard also said the jail at 600 Colorado St. has numerous maintenance problems, including plumbing old enough that replacement parts are nearly impossible to find.

The budget for the law-enforcement facility is still being revised by the county commission.

more than $500 in one semester. Interest is charged at a 6-percent annual rate and is payable annually from the date of the loan.

A borrower must be an American citizen who is a regularly enrolled student and who has attended K-State for at least one semester with a 2.0 grade point average. A guarantor must cosign the loan, regardless of the borrower's age.

To apply for this loan students should submit an application form to the Office of Student Financial Assistance. Normal processing time is one to two weeks.

Local banks are another source for students to acquire funds. Sunflower Bank has a student-loan program.

"The majority of our students who apply have an account here or are from one of our other branches," Therese Miller, vice president of Sunflower Bank, said.

UMB Bank also offers the basic student-loan package and has seen a decrease lately in the student-loan market.

For more information students can stop by the Office of Student Financial Assistance, Fairchild 104.

the situation in IRAQ

THE LATEST

BAGHDAD, Iraq — President Clinton declared two rounds of missile strikes against Iraqi military targets a success Wednesday while denying Iraq's allegations of a third missile strike on Baghdad, according to a CNN website.

Anti-aircraft fire lighted the skies of Baghdad late Wednesday, hours after the United States fired a new round of cruise missiles into southern Iraq and destroyed an Iraqi radar site that was preparing to attack an American F-16 fighter jet.

Detonations reverberated throughout the capital for 15 minutes, and air-raid sirens blared as the anti-aircraft batteries fired.

Washington insisted there had been no American, allied or other military operations in the area Wednesday evening, although an Iraqi military statement accused the United States of attacking Baghdad directly.

It was not clear if the gunners hit, or even had, specific targets, or whether the barrage was a government attempt to make Baghdad's residents feel under siege.

"The malicious American enemy ... sent his missiles aiming at several military positions and at heavily populated civilian sites," including Baghdad, the Iraqi statement said. "(Iraq's) sons confronted the missiles with efficiency and capability and downed a high percentage of them."

There was an explosion Wednesday night in the streets of the al-Hurriya residential area near Baghdad's old airport, which left a hole 6 feet wide and 3 feet deep.

However, the crater was too small to have been caused by a

WHAT YOU THINK

The recent bombings of Iraqi air-defense bases by the United States is bringing back unpleasant memories for some K-State students who experienced the Gulf War firsthand.

Nizar Kafity, senior in microbiology, lived in Kuwait 18 years before moving to the United States to attend college three years ago.

While Kafity said he supported the U.S. involvement during the Gulf War, he said he now opposes any American intervention in Iraq.

"I backed up the Gulf War 100 percent," he said. "But I don't think the U.S. should be there now."

> "The media portrayed it as totally devastating. It was bad, but it wasn't as bad as people said it was."

> SENIOR IN MICROBIOLOGY

Though Kuwait is not involved in the warring factions at this time, Kafity said he still worries about the safety of his mother and father who are still in Kuwait.

"The whole situation in the Middle East is kind of shaky right now," he said.

"It's kind of scary, because my parents are still in Kuwait."

Kafity said it's hard not to follow what's going on in Iraq, for the benefit of his parents.

He compared the fighting in neighboring Iraq to someone in Kansas, not noticing there's a war in Oklahoma.

He said it's hard not to pay attention when your neighbor is at war.

Kafity added that while things were grim during the Gulf War, he doesn't expect the present conflict in Iraq to reach the level the 1991 war did.

"The media portrayed it as totally devastating," Kafity said. "It was bad, but it wasn't as bad as people said it was."

The fighting halfway around the world is touching the life of another student at K-State.

An Iraqi student, who requested her name be withheld, said the most recent conflict in Iraq is making her thankful that she is able to live in the United States.

Task force-proposed honor system based on faculty trust, student responsibility ▶ To curb cheating, the Provost's Task Force on Academic Honesty presented an honor system to promote campus culture.

R.J. DIEPENBROCK
staff writer

A University task force is working to implement an honor system to curb cheating and change the culture of the campus.

The Provost's Task Force on Academic Honesty, which was formed in late 1994, presented a draft of an honor system before Student Senate in spring 1996. Mitchell Strauss has been the task force chairman since fall 1995.

The process moves to the Office of Student Academic Affairs for review and then back to Student Senate before going to the Faculty Senate, Strauss said.

"We have a long way to go," he said, "But the response has been supportive."

"An honor system is a broad umbrella of culture and practice and policy that could improve the climate on campus in context of improving academic honesty," he said.

The difference between an honor system and the present system K-State uses is responsibility and trust, Strauss said.

The present system uses proctors to monitor students during an exam, as well as using different forms of exams.

"The roles will be shifted," Strauss said. "Students should assert themselves with honesty, and the faculty should trust the students.

"This system will take advantage of the way people have been raised knowing that cheating is unacceptable."

Michael Dannells, associate professor of counseling and educational psychology, said an honor system gives students an explicit agreement to uphold an honor principle.

"An institution holds academic honesty highly and values it greatly," Dannells said.

"An honor code in and of itself is not enough," he said. "You have to begin to change the culture on campus."

Chris Hansen, student body president, said an honor system would be a showpiece for the University.

"It emphasizes trust and strengthens academic honesty," he said.

There are three objectives with which the task force has dealt with, Strauss said.

The first is drafting a new honor statement; two, creating new judicial procedures to compliment the new system; and three,

Computers swiped from Bluemont Hall

CHAD HELIN
staff reporter

Two computers and a printer were stolen from Bluemont Hall Monday.

The computer hardware was taken from adjacent offices in the basement of Bluemont. Barbara Havlicek, an occupant of one of the offices, said the criminals must have come in through a door.

"There are no other ways in or out, so they obviously used a door," Havlicek said.

Lt. Dave Johnson of the K-State Police, said there are no suspects at this time and an estimated loss has not been established.

Although the crime is not directly related to the long holiday weekend, University investigator Richard Herrman said it could have been a factor.

"Computer security is more of a problem during holidays due to the fact that there are fewer people around," Herrman said.

Recording serial numbers, tying or locking them down and keeping them in secure rooms are all things done to prevent computer theft on campus.

"Providing human monitors is the best way to deter criminals," Herrman said.

"But that gets hard to do in some of our 24-hour labs," he said.

Funds to help fix buildings

DEBBIE WOOD
staff reporter

White elephants are a problem for downtown Manhattan.

Just ask Scott Morrill of Manhattan Main Street.

White elephants are abandoned buildings that are not economically feasible to rehabilitate without help. Morrill is part of a project called Incentives Without Walls, which gives proprietors an opportunity to refurbish abandoned buildings.

IWW money is distributed by the state every year in the form of loans or grants. Participants must fill out an application and meet certain criteria to receive funding.

Cities have the responsibility of telling the state how much money they need for the upcoming year to fund the projects. That is how IWW got its name.

The program was initiated only a little more than 1-1/2 years ago.

"The first-year program was highly successful, and it's working good so far," Morrill said.

The program started in January 1995, when the Main Street advisory board held a conference with the secretary of state, who agreed to fund the program.

"We had five applications for last year's money and four applications for the first round of this year's money. There was one business awarded money for last year," Morrill said.

The business requested $1 million from the state and was promised $200,000, but it dropped out of the program. Strecker Gallery was selected to receive the money but hasn't received it yet.

Funding is awarded on the basis of who is perceived to bring the most jobs and revenue for Manhattan.

Julie Strecker, owner of Strecker Gallery in downtown Manhattan said, "IWW is a worthwhile program. The process is fairly easy, and there's not a lot of paperwork to fill out."

Strecker said the program was good for Manhattan, because there are a lot of white elephants that need renovation.

Strecker was an applicant for last year's funding but is waiting to acquire a building to begin renovation.

"IWW is just the sort of incentive that you need. It's a psychological boost that says the community supports you. What's good for downtown is good for Manhattan," Strecker said.

Kansas politicians support actions taken by Clinton against Saddam

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., and both candidates for the Senate seat vacated by Bob Dole in June voiced support Tuesday for President Clinton's action in the Middle East.

"Today, we undertook a measured response to unacceptable Iraqi military action," Kassebaum said in a statement released by her Washington office.

"We must continue to demonstrate to Saddam Hussein that he cannot out-wait our resolve and that peaceful compliance with the (U.N.) Security Council resolutions is his only available option.

"Our swift response was appropriate, and we remain prepared to respond further to any additional violations by Iraq."

Kassebaum also said it is important for the United States to work closely with its allies to strengthen the united front against Iraqi behavior.

Jill Docking, Democratic candidate for Dole's resigned Senate seat, also said she supports Clinton's action.

"From my experience representing Kansans on the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services, I have firsthand experience working with the Pentagon on issues affecting our military readiness," Docking said in a statement issued by her Wichita campaign office.

"This is a perfect example of why we must maintain a strong defense and take quick and decisive action when rogue nations threaten peace and stability in regions as vital as the Middle East."

Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Manhattan, the Republican nominee for Dole's seat, said the U.S. missile attack sends a clear signal the United States will not tolerate acts of aggression by Saddam.

"I commend the U.S. troops in the Gulf region who participated in this attack for their decisive action," Brownback said.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

We have much at stake in latest U.N.-Iraqi conflict

The recent conflict in the Middle East seems far removed from Manhattan.

But right now things are happening that you need to know and keep informed about.

Do you think what's happening in Iraq does not affect you?

Wrong.

It's hitting much closer to your home than you might have thought.

Fifty troops and six KC-135 refueling planes from McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita were sent to the Persian Gulf Saturday.

That's pretty close to home, eh?

If Operation: Provide Comfort escalates any further, our friends and family might be sent over to the Persian Gulf.

You could even be the next candidate for the camouflage suit.

Maybe you're not quite sure what's going on over there.

Well, they aren't alone in that. In fact, the United States has yet to explain exactly what the objective is over there.

What is the objective?

If you or your friends are going to be sent over there, don't you have the right to know what our objective is in sending them?

And do you think you're paying too much at the gas station now?

Well, grab a hold of your wallet, because this latest conflict promises to boost prices even further.

So you see, this affects us more than we might think.

This isn't just some little rumble in the desert.

When keeping ourselves up to date, we should question if there are any political motives involved in this situation.

This is an election year, and surely past presidents have been elected for their leadership in the midst of a conflict like this one.

No, we don't have all the answers.

Right now, it doesn't seem like anyone has them.

But it is our responsibility as voters, citizens and potential soldiers to ask the questions.

We shouldn't stop until we get the answers.

WHY WE CARE

It's everyone's responsibility to know what's going on in the Middle East. It affects all of us in more ways than we might think.

In Our Opinion, an editorial discussed and chosen by a majority of the editorial board, is written by editorial board. For information on who is an editorial board member or how you can become a member, contact Sera Tank at karolyi@ksu.ksu.edu.

Student loan pay-back time will come sooner than you think

I got a love letter from my bank the other day.

I loathe getting letters from banks.

I don't care if it is my statement or just a we've-changed-our-name-again notice.

Seeing that logo at the top, with my name in bold print, tends to give me goose bumps the size of bumblebees.

It's always bad news.

This particular time was no exception.

Since I am graduating in nine months, they sent a note to remind me that I am going to have to start paying back my student loans next December. The note went on to explain all the particulars of doing so.

They also sent me the exact total of the amount my loans came to.

At first, I thought it was a typo. Unfortunately, it wasn't.

After I caught my breath, convinced myself it was not something I needed to screw up six months of sobriety over, I sat down and figured out where all that money went and what demon from Hell had possessed me to take it all out in the first place.

I am sure my response is not that much different from those of many graduating seniors or any other students who have taken out student loans and are beginning to have nightmares about how they're going to pay them back.

For some of us, there was no other way to finance college.

With the increasing cost of tuition and books in college, combined with a scarcity of jobs that will pay above the minimum wage level, a lot of students are finding it necessary to take out student loans, not only to cover the cost of tuition but also the cost of living from semester to semester.

We are told again and again we have to pay it back, and we hear the penalties we'll have to endure for defaulting as if we were all children being frightened into honesty by fairy tale ghosts and goblins.

Still the list of scholarship descriptions reads like a crazy missing persons advertisement: "For the Lithuanian, deaf descendants of Myra P. Long who have worked for the Farm Bureau of Kansas for more than six years and are pursuing a career in lawn maintenance."

Trying to get a grant can feel like riding on an endless ferris wheel of eligibility issues, which can leave you feeling like a hamster in a wheel.

It can leave many students so tired and frustrated, we're almost relieved to sign away whatever chance we might have of being ulcer-free at one point in our adult life.

I suppose I could have scraped by without the majority of my student loans. I managed to make it to my sophomore year without incurring any, living on $50 per month after all my bills were paid.

> "Ask yourself if there is another way to get what you want without having to leave this institution as deeply in debt as I am. (Let's just say, if I stood on the back of bankruptcy, I'd by able to suck the big toe of deep debt.)"

However, like so many others in college, I got tired of scrapping by. It wasn't because I wanted to take off to Jamaica or anything, but I did want to do things and have things I couldn't afford on my own like insurance.

The problem is that no matter how many times I was warned, I don't think I really and truly thought about how much my future will be affected by taking out loans I didn't have a pressing need for.

For most of the seniors out there, this will appear common sense but for others who are still on the high of having received your first loan check and are eating out every night, you should probably consider a few things.

Before you take out any more student loans, think about what it is going to be like taking on a second or even a third job to pay it back.

Imagine writing a $300 or $400 check every month for 10 years.

Even if you are in a major, such as engineering or pre-medicine, that leads into jobs that traditionally bring much higher salaries than other fields, like teaching or accounting, weigh the fact that most of the time they require further training to really earn and that you might hold entry-level positions for years that might just keep you afloat financially.

Ask yourself if there is another way to get what you want without having to leave this institution as deeply in debt as I am. (Let's just say, if I stood on the back of bankruptcy, I'd be able to suck the big toe of deep debt.)

I'm not sorry I took out some of my student loans.

I got to do things I would never have gotten to do otherwise and I did use the money for more than just the occasional treat.

I don't regret the choice I made.

At least, not completely.

I will probably be eating peanut butter sandwiches and macaroni and cheese for most of my adult life though.

Just be aware, if you are mortgaging your future to ensure that you have one, it's going to be a long, hard road to financial freedom.

Barefootin'

Step out of your comfort zone; learn to understand your habits

MY

Rhett
HARTMAN

Sometimes it's easy to get lost in habit.

Think about it — when was the last time in your life that you didn't walk around with shoes?

Shoes are nice, let me tell you, but it's not like your feet alone weren't meant for walking.

So go ahead.

Walk to your next class and hold your shoes in your hands.

Well?

You're not going to do it, are you?

It just isn't worth it to break old habits. Maybe you just don't feel like it.

But will you ever walk around barefoot again?

Maybe the better question is will you ever feel comfortable breaking such an old habit?

Old habits are one of the most difficult things to understand.

I think this is because our minds are natural habit-forming things.

For our minds to concentrate on what is important and at hand, it forms unquestionable habits as not encumber itself.

For example, you probably rarely worry about where the closest supply of fresh water is.

Why need to, when the city provides water for you?

So your mind has made it a habit to not worry about where your drinkable water comes from.

Same goes for your shoes and most everything else.

Questioning these habits sounds so unreasonable.

Why would I even want to walk around barefoot?

The answer to this question cannot be answered by someone who has not removed their shoes. The beauty of shoelessness is forever hidden from the eyes of habit.

So go ahead, shed your shoes.

But remember, if you don't go barefoot today, then just remember to listen to your feet.

If they cry for freedom from the oppressive shoe-habit, let them go. In ignorance our habits will crush their meager pleas.

Yet it doesn't stop at shoes and water.

Look around you and try to pick out what has become an unquestioned habit.

I'm not telling you to reject the entirety of civilization, but at least understand what your mind has taken as habit.

Then you can be aware of what you may feel about a certain situation.

Have you ever questioned the audio perfection of compact discs?

I hadn't, until last year when a roommate of mine said that a vinyl album, paired with a decent stereo system, is the closest thing to musical perfection.

I didn't believe him either, at first.

But as the thought ran around my head, it made more and more sense.

A CD is a digital, binary, disconnected medium for recording music.

Music is a live, dynamic thing, untouchable by a laser.

Vinyl, if kept well, is an absolute echo of music.

There is no computer to screw things up in between the disc and the ear.

Not until I compared a vinyl record to a CD could I appreciate the difference.

Alone, each one seems very good.

But alongside each other, there are marked differences that our habit has hidden from us.

I listened to the album "Days of Future Past" by the Moody Blues.

This is a good album. But when I heard it on vinyl, it blew me away.

I could actually sense how the CD version sounded digital.

On vinyl, the echoes were more natural, not a product of remastering. The bass was a flowing thing, not mechanistic and predictable.

Some people have said that since a record has to be physically touched by the stylus to be played, it deteriorates and therefore can't be as good as a CD.

Since vinyl is the exact copy of the music, you have to sacrifice something to reach this perfection.

If cared for, a record will not lose its musical intensity.

But breaking habits goes even further than musical tastes.

Do you eat with chopsticks or with a fork in a Chinese restaurant?

Have you ever said hi to a complete stranger?

Shaved with a non-teflon coated straight-edge, single-blade razor?

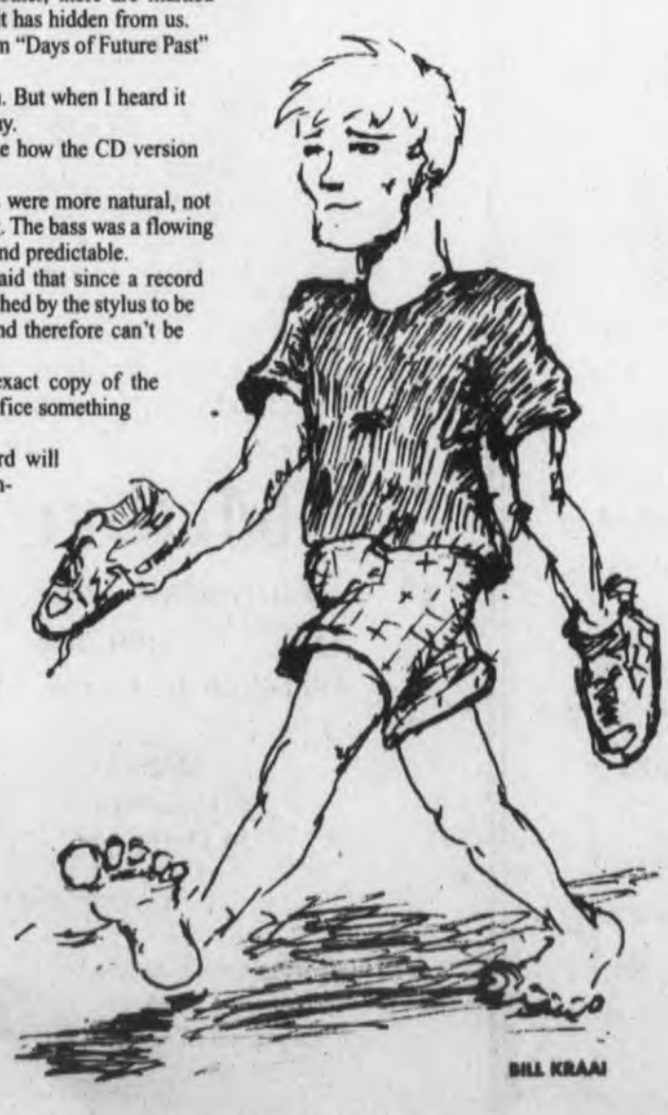
Walked when you could have driven your car?

Not carried a timepiece?

Not used hair spray?

Left the ball cap at home?

Stopped and smelled the flowers? Stopped and picked the flowers?



Grown your hair long? Cut your hair short?

Bought the expensive kind of beer? Spoke a different language?

Smoked a real cigar? Didn't smoke a cigarette? Wrote a letter when you could have typed it?

To someone you love, said "I love you"?

Re-offering 'Foreigner'

Editor,

The theater department is repeating its summer offering, "The Foreigner" through Saturday this week. Go see it. They have done a superb job of presentation. The acting is very professional, and the play is one of the funniest productions we have ever seen. The play will be at 8 p.m. Sept. 3-7 in Nichols Theatre. It is well worth seeing.

English-only laws

Editor,

If I understood Neil Pundit's comments regarding declaring English as the official language for the United States, James Armagost's recent response to Mr. Pundit missed the point, which was neither that the government should pass yet another law or that there might be value in having diverse languages.

As I understand the situation, Mr. Pundit (and the English First lobbying group) simply want the government to stop paying for the very limited use of other languages in government activities.

After a recent election in a nearby state, I remember reading a newspaper article, which reported that that state (Texas?) spent more than $5,000 per ballot written in a non-English language, most of which were not even used. It may be wishful thinking, but I'd like to think my tax dollars are being spent on more-useful things than expensive scrap paper.

McConnell troops shipped to Gulf

JEREMY KELLEY
staff reporter

About 150 troops and a half dozen KC-135 refueling planes from McConnell Air Force Base were sent to the Persian Gulf on Saturday in an attempt to hasten the Iraqi missile strike on the Kurdish.

"The troops were put on alert Friday and deployed the next afternoon," said Capt. Mary Beth Jarvis, public affairs officer at McConnell.

These troops, however, along with the other 48 that were already stationed there, did not take place in the missile strike Tuesday.

"Right now we are deploying troops in order to build our presence in the Middle East," Jarvis said.

The troops were sent to a private area in the Gulf region, where they would undergo training as a precautionary measure while other military leaders attempt to halt Saddam Hussein's threats against the Kurds, Jarvis said.

"The troops will await there in the staging base and wait for further development," she said.

"Their duties will include air refueling support for fighter planes during combat and general maintenance of planes and tanks."

The troops who were sent include air crews such as pilots and navigators, maintenance people and support crews, whose job is to keep the refueling tankers in the air.

Jarvis said she could not comment on how long the troops would be there, but she said the troops were ready and the sudden shipment was routine to them.

"We are not certain as to what will occur next, but we are definitely prepared to send more troops if need be," Jarvis said.

cruise missile. The exact cause of the blast was not immediately clear. One possibility would be Iraqi anti-aircraft fire returning to the ground.

The Iraqi military said one person was killed and 11 were injured.

Government-inspired anti-American protests were reported in Babil and another town south of Baghdad.

"Iraqi willpower will not be defeated by the tyrants, no matter how far they go in their hateful sins, malice and aggression," said an Iraqi military communique. "The criminal Clinton is riding for a fall into the abyss of vice."

But President Clinton, in his first public assessment of the American attacks on Iraq's air-defense system, called the operation a success and said Saddam was now strategically worse off.

The two U.S. missile strikes were ordered in response to Saddam's weekend assault on Kurdish rebels. Some 45,000 Iraqi soldiers and 300 tanks captured Irbil, the main city in the U.S.-declared Kurdish safe haven in northern Iraq, before withdrawing this week.

In Ankara, Turkey, government officials said Wednesday they were considering sending troops into northern Iraq to block Turkish Kurdish rebels from taking advantage of the latest turmoil to attack Turkey.

Meanwhile, the U.N. Security Council failed Wednesday to agree on a common response to the crisis.

Britain's deputy U.N. Ambassador Stephen Gomersall said his delegation would revise its draft resolution, the original of which condemned Iraq for its incursion into the north, and demanded an immediate withdrawal. It made no mention of the U.S. missile attacks.

Iraq said this week's U.S. attacks have killed eight people — six on Tuesday and two Wednesday. Iraq officials said 37 were wounded, including 11 Wednesday evening. But there was no independent confirmation to any of the claims.

Iraq's armed forces also claimed Iraqi defenses shot down several missiles and a pilotless reconnaissance plane. U.S. officials denied the claim.

On Wednesday night, Saddam visited air-defense headquarters in Baghdad and met with senior officers, the official Iraqi News Agency reported.

It said the Iraqi leader "gave his valuable instructions on the way of defending and protecting the land and sky of our dear country."

American, British and French pilots took part in U.S. and allied air patrols Wednesday over the newly enlarged southern no-fly zone, said Air Force Gen. Joseph Ralston. The zone now extends to within 30 miles of southern Baghdad.

Iraq's two no-fly zones were created after the 1991 Persian Gulf War to protect Kurds in the north and Shiite Muslims in the south from the wrath of Saddam's military. After the enlargement of the southern zone, roughly half of Iraq is now off-limits to Saddam's warplanes.

The student requested her name be withheld from the story because she works closely with professors who know her only by her name, not her history in Iraq. She did not want to be sympathized because she has lived in a war zone.

"It's never easy to live with war, no matter where you are," she said. "It's very hard to forget what happened."

The student, who grew up in Baghdad, the capital of Iraq, said she lost friends and family during the Gulf War and doesn't want to see that happen again.

She said she left the warring country exactly 15 days before the Gulf War fighting began and that she has no immediate family still in the country.

The Iraqi native, who has called Kansas her home for more than six years, said the lines of communication to her former homeland are not easily accessible.

"It's just kind of impossible to get contact," she said. "It's just horrible."

The Muslim Student Association at K-State offered only a vague response regarding its opinion of the fighting in Iraq.

"As a member of Muslim Student Association, we don't stand for anybody," one representative said.

The future is now and later

■ K-State's cross country team opens competition Saturday. Goals differ between the men's and women's sides.

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

A house's foundation must be strong before the framework can be installed. The rest of the construction falls into place.

The same can be said about the K-State cross country program.

Coach Terry Drake said he has different concerns for the upcoming season when comparing the men's side to the women's. But each concern is based on the idea of building.

"On the women's side, I'm worried how our freshmen react to college. It's a time-building sport, and we're building the groundwork for the future," Drake said.

> "This team is better than they think. This may be the year."
> • TERRY DRAKE, CROSS COUNTRY COACH

Building that groundwork requires recruiting strong material. Drake might have found the right recruits in freshmen Kathryn Wolfram and Kelly Andra.

Drake said he expects Wolfram, a Liberal native, to have a long-term effect on the K-State program.

"Kathryn is maybe going to be one of the best girls K-State has ever had," he said.

Competing for that title will be Andra, a Shawnee Mission Northwest High School graduate who was the 6A state champion last year in the mile and the two-mile. The Kansas City Star voted her the metro-area's top high-school female athlete last year.

> "It's a time-building sport, and we're building the groundwork for the future"
> • TERRY DRAKE, CROSS COUNTRY COACH

Wolfram and Andra join a squad that lacks tested veterans.

Senior Samantha McNamara was the Cats' No. 1 runner in the 3,000- and 5,000-meters in track last year, finishing seventh in the Big 8.

"She's the glue, most certainly the person who ties it all together," Drake said about McNamara and how her leadership effects the team.

Drake said he expects McNamara to be the No. 1 runner this year, but that depends on how strong a runner Wolfram will be.

Also expected to compete in one of the Cats' top positions is Charity Swartz. She was the No. 4 runner last season, but Drake said he expects more from her this fall.

"She trained really hard over the summer, and she had a great track season. She could do a lot better this year," Drake said.

On the men's side, Drake has a different agenda.

"The groundwork is now," he said.

That groundwork consists of five returning runners who have the ability to carry the squad to victories. Drake said his only concerns on the men's side are its health and its depth.

"If one of our top five guys gets hurt, we'll be OK, because we have a strong sixth man. But if two of those guys get hurt, we'll be in trouble," he said.

Perhaps the biggest strength the men's squad has going for it is its ignorance, Drake said.

"This team is better than they think. This may be the year," he said.

"They can go to a meet and be racing against someone and not know how good that other person is. That could be a good thing, because they don't know that the other team is supposed to be better. Sometimes ignorance is bliss."

With the John Thorpe departing for personal reasons, Ryan Clive-Smith is the lone proven runner on the team, but Zach Davies and Chris May are expected to run well this season for the Wildcats.

Davies, a 4.08-miler, was a walk-on to the program and is in his sophomore year. But Drake said he believes Davies could be one of the best runners in the conference.

"He could be a great surprise. He sure looks good," Drake said.

He said he also expects good things from David Dominguez and Paul Birnbaum this season.

But the men's side is a team that is untested and still learning to run together.

"After the first meet, we'll see how well they run," Drake said. "But I really think they're starting to see that they can be something special."

JOHN ETZEL and Ryan Clive-Smith wipe sweat from their faces while running in the pack with other members of the men's cross country team during practice Wednesday afternoon in Warner Park.

Senior wants to move on with life outside volleyball

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

KELLI LUTHER, senior swing hitter, spends time rehabilitating her knee. Luther tore her left anterior cruciate ligament, an injury which usually requires surgery. However, using equipment such as stationary bicycles and stairmasters, Luther is attempting to rehabilitate instead of surgery.

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

One of the things most under-publicized about athletics is the injuries.

If there is doubt about the mental stress and heartache injuries can cause an athlete, just ask volleyball player Kelli Luther. She'll erase that doubt.

Luther transferred to K-State from the University of Wisconsin after her sophomore season in 1994. She averaged 62 games a year in her two seasons as a Badger.

During preseason practice this season, Luther tore her left anterior cruciate ligament on a routine exercise.

"How it happened is the weirdest part about the whole thing," Luther said. "I was playing front-row defense, and I turned my body, and my leg just stayed where it was. It's a move I've done a thousand times, and for some reason, it just decided to give. I could tell right away that my leg wasn't doing what it was supposed to."

As a senior this season, the injury is threatening the final year of Luther's volleyball career.

"I've had two opinions, and both doctors say they would like me to go ahead and have the surgery," Luther said.

Surgery would mean an end to her career. Instead, Luther has opted to rehabilitate her injury as best she can and try to make a comeback this year.

"At this point, I'm just doing rehab," Luther said. "The doctors are giving me four to six weeks before they can even evaluate the injury. I'm just going day to day. I can't even walk normal yet. Hopefully I'll get that back soon, which would be a good start."

> "It's hard for me to voice my opinions when I can't really get up and do anything about them."
> • KELLI LUTHER, VOLLEYBALL SWING HITTER

Luther's rehabilitation schedule includes working every day the team practices and an extra two to three times a week with a physical therapist.

"As for what I'm going to be able to do this year, I don't know yet," Luther said. "I'm just going to strengthen my leg and accomplish what I can."

The possibility of taking a medical redshirt this year is something Luther is not really even considering.

"Academically, I'd like to move on with the rest of my life," Luther said. "I'm going into pre-occupational therapy, and I need to go to a different school besides K-State to get my degree."

Not only is the injury untimely because this is Luther's senior year, but it's also a year when the Wildcats are coming off one of their best seasons. Expectations are that the team will be even better this year.

"I think the team this year is just unlimited in what it can accomplish," Luther said. "It's exciting to see all the big strides made in the program and exciting to be a part of it."

One of the things Luther is having the most trouble with is the uncertainty of her exact role on the team.

"It's hard for me to voice my opinions when I can't really get up and do anything about them," Luther said. "The girls are working really hard, and I've had great support from all my teammates."

The injury has also put a damper on some of the dreams Luther had envisioned happening this season, like playing on the same team with her sister, Linsey Luther.

"I always thought I would have the opportunity to be a senior in my last game and think to myself, 'This is the end of my career,'" Luther said.

"I also thought it would be nice to have the opportunity to play with my sister this year. She redshirted last year, and we were both going to have the opportunity to play this season.

"We played with each other in high school, and she's one of my best friends. It would be a very special experience to play with her again," she said.

Still, with all of the unknowns, Luther said she won't give up.

"Who knows? Maybe I'll be back," Luther said. "I don't want to limit myself."

New leagues could determine longevity of women's sports

The talking heads in the sports world have called 1996 "The Year of the Woman."

The Olympics were the primary impetus for the title — the drama of the gymnastics competition, the changing of the guard in swimming, America's return to the top in women's basketball.

But The Year of the Woman might be the most overused cliche of the '90s. Woman might have her year, but until it lasts, it doesn't mean anything.

The first indicator of whether women's sports have really taken their rightful place in society will be the success of two new women's professional basketball leagues, the American Basketball League and the Women's National Basketball League.

The leagues began with different philosophies.

The ABL wants women's basketball to be a premier sport during basketball season, with eight teams playing between October and March.

Teams are in medium-sized markets with a history of supporting women's basketball.

MY

Dan
LEWERENZ

The idea is to play in smaller arenas that can be filled for a women's game, rather than in a larger coliseum likely to appear empty.

While competition for fans with women's college basketball and men's and women's pro basketball is inevitable, teams with local college powers, such as San Jose and Seattle, have made a concerted effort to avoid overlapping the schedules.

Marquee players, including a number of America's Olympians, will be paid as much as $125,000, with other players earning $40,000-70,000 per year.

Although the WNBA has not released details about its operating plans, some general information is known. The league will consist of eight teams playing in the summer, probably from June to August.

Teams will be part of current NBA franchises and will play in the same arenas the men occupy during the regular season.

Owners hope to draw the best talent from the ABL and various foreign leagues to play a talent-rich game with no other basketball as competition.

This isn't the first time an American women's professional league has been attempted. As recently as two years ago, Kansas City, Mo., was the home of the Mustangs, who played in a mid-western league.

> "Woman might have her year, but until it lasts, it doesn't mean anything."

But none of the leagues of the past could offer the money and prestige the ABL and WNBA will bring.

The ABL has already lined up First USA Bank and Reebok as sponsors, elevating them to the level of other professional sports. The WNBA will have the entire marketing apparatus of the NBA, perhaps the most effective in the history of sports marketing, at its disposal.

Both leagues have already lined up TV contracts as well. The ABL will have more than a dozen games televised by SportsChannel and its regional affiliates, and the WNBA has contracts with NBC, Lifetime and ESPN, with each network broadcasting one game per week.

But all of it — the salaries, the endorsements, the TV contracts, everything — means nothing if the fans don't come.

"Basketball is basketball, athletes are athletes," as Spike Lee says in a Nike commercial. But with that being the case, women's basketball, and women athletes, will be judged like men.

The ABL or the WNBA, or both, (most observers believe there will be a merger of the two leagues in the next couple years) must fill arenas, sell sweatshirts and display their players in new cross-training shoes, or they won't survive.

Gymnastics can't do it. As uplifting as it was to watch Carrie Strug nail that landing on one foot, the Olympic limelight can only last so long. Swimming is in the same boat. And while American tennis players are starting to rise to the top again, tennis simply does not have the mass appeal of basketball.

This might be the Year of the Woman. But it's soon to be the past. And the last thing women's sports need, after decades of advancement, is for their best years to be behind them.

Habitat plans semester activities

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

Five K-State students gathered in Atlanta last weekend with more than 2,000 people from across the world for the 20th-anniversary celebration of Habitat for Humanity.

Highlights of the student-funded trip included listening to keynote speakers such as Millard Fuller, founder of Habitat for Humanity, and attending several brainstorming workshops.

Most of the members went to workshops that emphasized building stronger campus groups, while others met with different chapters to exchange fundraising techniques.

"We got a lot of ideas of other chapters' fundraisers," Karah Levely, senior in advertising, said.

One money-making idea members discussed while in Atlanta included compiling and selling a recipe book.

Another seminar provided the K-State chapter with insight about building its own house and problems that might arise.

K-State's Habitat for Humanity chapter is trying to raise about $30,000 for this spring so it can sponsor their own house in the Manhattan area.

"The word is getting out about substandard housing," said Jason Leavitt, work projects co-chair and senior in construction science.

One problem the group has faced is getting the community interested in donating to the cause.

"It's a hand-up, not a hand-out," Leavitt said.

For each house built, the new owners must return a required number of sweat-equity hours on another Habitat for Humanity-sponsored home.

Leavitt said the owners are taught business techniques for paying bills and keeping records, responsibility and care for the home, and management skills. They are not just given the house.

The K-State chapter goal for the semester is to raise enough money to sponsor its own house. This is possible if every student would give up about $2 per semester.

"You could go without a beer for one night," Leavitt said.

Each semester Habitat for Humanity tries to have one big fundraising event. In May, the chapter was host to a bike ride. For a $10 entry fee, cyclists received a T-shirt and biked across Manhattan to raise money for Habitat for Humanity. Donations from sponsors helped make prizes available.

In October, the group is planning another benefit concert similar to last year's, said Jennifer Gassmann, senior in social work.

Habitat for Humanity gets outside help from KMKF-FM 101.5 and the Wareham Opera House. This makes the benefit concert profitable.

All of these ideas help raise money for the campus group to take spring break trips to work on houses across the United States. Two years ago, members went to New Orleans.

Last year K-State's group took a spring break trip to Abilene, Texas, to work on housing projects.

"We built during the daytime and then took the night to see the sights," Leavitt said.

Most people go to Padre Island or somewhere and come back with only a headache, he said. At least with this kind of spring break, the members come back with a good feeling.

The trip to Atlanta was funded by the participants with a little help from the Student Governing Association.

Living quarters for the weekend included cabins at a local 4-H campground inside the Atlanta city limits. The accommodations left much to be desired, Leavitt said.

The group will be meeting Sept. 10 to break into groups to discuss more fundraising ideas and plan events for the upcoming semester.

the new system; and three, develop two ongoing programs to educate both students and faculty on how to implement and accept the new system.

"My goal as chair is to have a system worked out by the end of the academic year," Strauss said.

Dannells said by developing a new honor system, the culture and attitude on campus would change, making students more responsible for their actions.

The transition from the present academic policy to the new honor system will take some time, Strauss said.

"You have to expect students to do the right thing, and faculty has to learn how to trust students," Strauss said.

"But there will be a knee-jerk reaction," he said.

Dannells said one way to make the transition smooth is to have open discussion between those developing the system and those affected by what the new system would bring.

"You ask students to be accountable, but individuals have to decide for themselves," Dannells said.

Hansen said there would have to be a change in the mindset on campus.

"It's a step-by-step process," Hansen said. "We knew you couldn't stop cold turkey."

As for penalties, an option is for an honor council to be established, including a mix of both students and faculty who would review the facts of each case and pass judgment. There would also be an appeals system.

Students facing the Honor Council, if found guilty of violating the Honor System, would fail the course in which the violation occurred and would have it marked as such on their transcripts.

"The burden for cheating becomes more significant," Strauss said. "The penalties are clear and serious."

Russian dancers debunk myths

DARCIE MCCONKEY
staff reporter

Some K-State dancers experienced a small piece of Russian culture Wednesday when the Vesna Voronezh Russian Folk Dancers and Musicians visited a dance theater class.

Vesna is the Russian folk dance and music troupe traveling through Kansas as part of a cultural and educational exchange program. This troupe was first seen by a Kansas delegation when it was visiting Russia last year. The delegation was so impressed by the troupe that it encouraged the dancers and musicians to come to the United States.

Through this exchange, K-State students had the opportunity to witness another culture in action. Members of Vesna demonstrated their interpretation of dance and music during a dance theater lab. Each student then had the opportunity to learn some Russian dance movements.

"It was very interesting to see their interpretation of dance. They put so much character into their movements," Melissa Slinkard, sophomore in dance, said.

The troupe, which consists of 20 Russian college students, communicates its diverse culture through dance routines and live folk music.

Because of the communist rule of Russia for the past 70 years, Emmett L. Wright, K-State professor and director of ARIOS-Kansas (a nonprofit branch of the Russian-American International Association for the Development and Integration of Education Systems) said he believes many people have preconceived notions about Russian people. He said he had imagined communism had deleted all culture from Russian society.

"I thought Russia would have a very barren culture because of communism, but when I met the Russian people and saw how they lived, I knew I was very wrong.

"They were indeed suppressed during this period of time, so the Russian people chose to express themselves through dance and music. I believe watching Vesna perform is one of the best ways to experience their culture. The Russian troupe is truly exceptional in their talents."

Although Russian culture is different from that of American culture, Wright said he believes "they are just like us because they are humans with wants and needs. In fact, Russians are more like us than most people can imagine." Wright's experience taught him about the ethnic pride of Russia, he said.

The Vesna troupe will stay with host families while in Manhattan before it leaves for a tour of Kansas. After performing on Friday at McCain Auditorium , Vesna will travel to other universities and high schools in Kansas, as well as the Kansas State Fair.

Kansa sculpture to top off Statehouse dome

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

A bronze, 20-foot tall Kansa Native American will top the Statehouse dome more than 100 years after the Kansas Legislature first planned a sculpture for it.

K-State graduate Richard Bergen has been working on the sculpture for about six years.

The Kansas Legislature planned a sculpture of Ceres, the Roman goddess of fertility, in 1889. But by the time the dome was built in 1903, the Legislature had decided Ceres had questionable morals and should not go on the dome.

In 1984 the Legislature restarted the process of putting a sculpture on the Statehouse dome.

The Kansas Arts Commission chose Bergen through a nationwide competition. Anyone with any connections to Kansas could enter. This included people who were born here or who had lived here.

Bergen said he decided what to sculpt by looking at the ideas Kansans sent to the Statehouse. Most of the ideas were from children, and Bergen said about 75 percent of the drawings were of Native Americans.

After he decided to sculpt a Native American, he consulted a book by a friend of his about the Kansa tribe. He found Topeka was in the middle of the tribe's hunting grounds.

The Kansa tribe is important in Topeka-area history, said Jim Reardon, director of facilities management for Kansas and member of the Capitol-Area Plaza Authority Committee.

Bergen made a 5-1/2-foot model to enter in the competition. This model is the one that will go on the grounds to raise money. The sculpture is called "Ad Astra."

"I took that from the state motto to incorporate it into the feeling of the project," Bergen said.

Before the sculpture can go on top of the dome, a model of the sculpture will go on the Statehouse grounds to raise money for the dome sculpture.

Bergen said he wants to sell bricks and bronze plaques that will surround the model. The groundbreaking for the sculpture on the grounds will probably be in about six months.

He said he is waiting for permission from the Capitol-Area Plaza Authority Committee to break ground.

"Once they turn us loose, we'll be able to go with it," Bergen said.

The state began an engineering study for the dome sculpture about a week ago. The study is necessary so the sculpture will not injure people around the building.

"It will be 10 times stronger than it needs to be so nobody will be injured," Bergen said. "It has to have the same integrity as the building."

The dome sculpture will be put on the dome with a large crane or a helicopter.

"It can be done either way," Bergen said. "I think they'll use a crane, because as windy as it is in Kansas, you'd have to have a perfect day for a helicopter."

"I think he's coming very close to fulfilling his dreams," Reardon said.

He said if people support Bergen with donations, the project will come together.

Bergen got his master's degree at K-State. He earned his bachelor of fine arts degree at Bethany College in Lindsborg, and he earned his doctorate at the University of Kansas.

He taught in Salina USD 305 and was director of art education for that district. He owns the Bergen Gallery in Salina.

Best of 'Star Wars' can be found on Internet

Every week, Darin Siefkes, senior in history, will review various sites on the World Wide Web in this space.
Do you know an interesting site, have a question or want to comment?

E-mail Siefkes at wings@ksu.edu.

A long time ago in a studio far, far away, a movie was made.

"Star Wars" is arguably the greatest film of all time and has a very special place in most net-citizens hearts.

This week we look at the best of this Lucas Original on the Internet.

Star Wars - Episode 1
(http://www.tcfhe.com/starwars/)

Our first stop is the "official" 20th Century Fox Home Entertainment Star Wars World Wide Web site.

Though it is nothing more than a commercial for all the merchandising that has been released in recent years, it does have some redeeming values.

I really like the quicktime movies that are here.

But if you already own the trilogy, they are pretty pointless to download.

Once the novelty value has worn off, few but the hard core fans will visit this section.

The character descriptions that are provided don't give any hidden information that isn't already commonly known.

I do like some of the conceptual artwork that is scattered throughout the page, which makes the time spent here worthwhile.

The graphics are excellent, and the page is a very well-designed marketing tool worthy of Lucas himself.

Sienar Fleet Systems
(http://miavx1.acs.muohio.edu/~meyercj/)

For those who are looking at joining the corporate world, I'm sure that Sienar Fleet Systems is looking for good people.

Sienar are the people who design all of the Empire's fighters including Tie, fighters, bombers and interceptors.

This is a beautiful page that is just fun to look at. The graphics alone are worth the time to visit this page.

All fighter models have a sales brochure included to help buyers decide on what vehicle of mass destruction is right for them.

In the future, the author is planning on adding the specifications and blueprints for all models.

One thing that is lacking is an online order form.

I don't think parking would be a problem, even at K-State, if you were trying to land a Tie-Fighter.

The Star Wars Homepage at UPENN
(http://www.stwing.upenn.edu:8001/~jruspini/starwars.html/)

This homepage is considered by many to be the best "Star Wars" homepage in the world.

After a rumor flew around the net that this page was going to be shut down for copyright infringements, LucasFilm issued a press release praising this homepage.

One of the best ways to spruce that drab operating system we know as windows is to download sounds from the archive and use them instead of the normal sounds.

The archive has a list of sounds that fills pages.

The missing scenes that have been cut throughout the years are listed here. These also include Biggs and Jabba from the first movie.

There is even a picture of the original Jabba from "A New Hope."

All of the information about the new films (that has been gathered outside Lucas's group) is archived here.

This page is so good that anyone who loves the movies must visit it.

Department aids FBI, brides, researchers

For More Information
Contact the Department of Climatology at 532-7019.

Missy Snodgrass
staff reporter

Many organizations and agencies contact the Department of Climatology because it can give information on weather conditions for specific times. But the department does more than just provide weather information.

The department offers many services students might not know about. It has helped solve crimes and plan weddings, and it helps with research projects.

Questions are asked by insurance companies, law-enforcement agencies and the FBI.

Mary Knapp, state climatologist, gave an example of a criminal case the department could handle that was investigated by the Wisconsin climatology department.

It helped with a case that involved a bag of cocaine and the morning dew.

A suspect was fleeing from a crime scene and dropped a bag of cocaine. She had claimed that it wasn't hers. Law-enforcement officials asked the climatology department to compare the amount of dew on the grass surrounding the bag to the amount of dew on the bag. After comparing the dew amounts, the experts determined the bag had been recently dropped since there wasn't enough dew on the bag for that time of the morning.

The K-State climatology department has had five calls last month alone from law-enforcement agencies across the state.

"These cases are still in litigation, so it probably isn't wise to discuss them," Knapp said.

Departments around campus are encouraged to use the department as a source for weather information.

"I would like students to know that our office is available. If I can't answer a question, then I will refer them to someone who can," Knapp said.

Rod Swick, senior in architectural engineering, who works for the department, said, "The types of requests we get can be interesting.

"Writers call to get a historical weather background on a certain time period for a book, or brides can call to get a weather prediction forecast for the time of their wedding, or students needing specific weather information for research projects can call," Knapp said.

Steve Welch, professor in agronomy, recommends the use of the climatology department. In one of his classes, Agriculture Simulation Modeling, students construct models using weather information that can project what a system does over time in a particular area.

"The Weather Data Library is where we look for this information," Welch said.

Although the department helps on these other calls, it has two significant functions, Knapp said. First, it supports researchers with weather information that is kept in a centralized location, here at K-State.

Secondly, it acts as an archive facility for the state. There are volunteers all over the state who monitor precipitation and temperature levels. After they record the data, they send it to the main department on campus.

In 1975, Kansas Legislature eliminated the state climate program, and Dean Bark took over the program at K-State.

He retired in 1989, and Knapp took his place. This also marked the transition of the climatology department from the physics department to extension services.

Although K-State became the official observation site in 1975, records have dated back as far as 1856 on campus.

G.I.F.T. program targets seniors

Cecily Rodriguez
staff reporter

As a member of the Big 12, K-State finds itself at odds with some new competition — not just on the football field.

K-State trails Texas A&M by one percentage point in alumni support, putting it second in the Big 12. The Student Foundation would like to move the Aggies right out of first place, so it is starting early.

From 6 to 9 tonight at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, Sam's Town Casino will be sponsoring a kick-off for Student Foundation's Graduates Investing For Tomorrow program (GIFT).

The event is for seniors only and students will be marked off of an official master list to prove they are seniors. Students will receive a complimentary deck of cards from Sam's Town and can enjoy a few hours of food and entertainment.

They will also be entered into a grand prize drawing for a free trip to the casino.

GIFT is a program designed to inform seniors about the necessity of alumni support and has been set up to ease students into the donation process. Although seniors won't be asked to donate any money right away, donations are always welcome.

Iraqis watchful of Kurds

■ Iraqi troops retreat from Irbil as Turkey readies troops for northern Iraq.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

IRBIL, Iraq — Apparently yielding to U.S. pressure, Iraqi troops kept close watch but did not intervene as two rival Kurdish factions battled Thursday outside the largest Kurdish city in northern Iraq.

Saddam Hussein's troops apparently heeded the warnings following two days of American attacks on Iraqi radar and command sites, backing away from any involvement in the fighting a few miles south of Irbil.

But a new problem for the region arose when Turkey said it will send troops into northern Iraq to prevent Kurdish rebels fleeing the fighting from crossing its border.

Elsewhere, the skies over southern Iraq were calm. U.S. warplanes patrolled a newly expanded no-fly zone following American cruise-missile attacks on Iraqi air-defense installations Tuesday and Wednesday.

In Paris, Secretary of State Warren Christopher won limited support from France to help patrol the two no-fly zones the allies imposed following the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The French will resume patrols Monday in the north and broaden their patrols in the south, though they will not cover as wide an area as patrols by the United States and Britain. France had objected to this week's U.S. missile strikes.

In the Iraqi capital of Baghdad, hundreds of Arabs burned an effigy of President Clinton, shouted anti-American slogans and pledged support for Saddam.

The Baghdad protest and Kurdish fighting in the north came a day after Clinton pronounced himself satisfied with U.S. attacks on Iraqi radar and command centers south of Baghdad. Clinton also asserted most Iraqi troops had left the Kurds' enclaves in and around Irbil.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Glyn Davies said that while the Iraqis have pulled back most of their mechanized infantry from the Irbil area, they retain an ability to intervene in the region.

"(Saddam has) reintroduced a massive security presence in the area under cover of these deployments," Davies said. "This gives him a new and, we think, troubling ability to intimidate Kurds and others in the north." He did not elaborate.

Thursday's fighting was centered near Bestana, just south of Irbil, a major city captured last week by the Kurdistan Democratic Party. The flow of KDP fighters streaming to the battlefield increased sharply Wednesday and Thursday.

The KDP screamed victory slogans and sang marching songs, traveling south in any vehicle it could find to do battle with its Iran-backed rivals, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

A U.N. guard protecting international aid workers in Irbil told the Associated Press that clashes southeast of the city were pretty substantial.

"It was not possible to cross through the area," said the guard, speaking on condition of anonymity. He said U.N. vehicles had to turn back.

Iraqi tanks, however, were seen by journalists along the road between Irbil and the town of Kuysanjak mid-afternoon Thursday, waiting without intervening while the two Kurdish groups battled nearby. Saddam's tanks and heavy artillery appeared settled in around the Koshtapa district 12 miles south of Irbil.

Earlier, the PUK had claimed that Iraqi troops backed by about 150 tanks were attacking its positions in Bestana.

But CIA Director John Deutch said intelligence reports indicated Saddam's troops and tank units were withdrawing from the area.

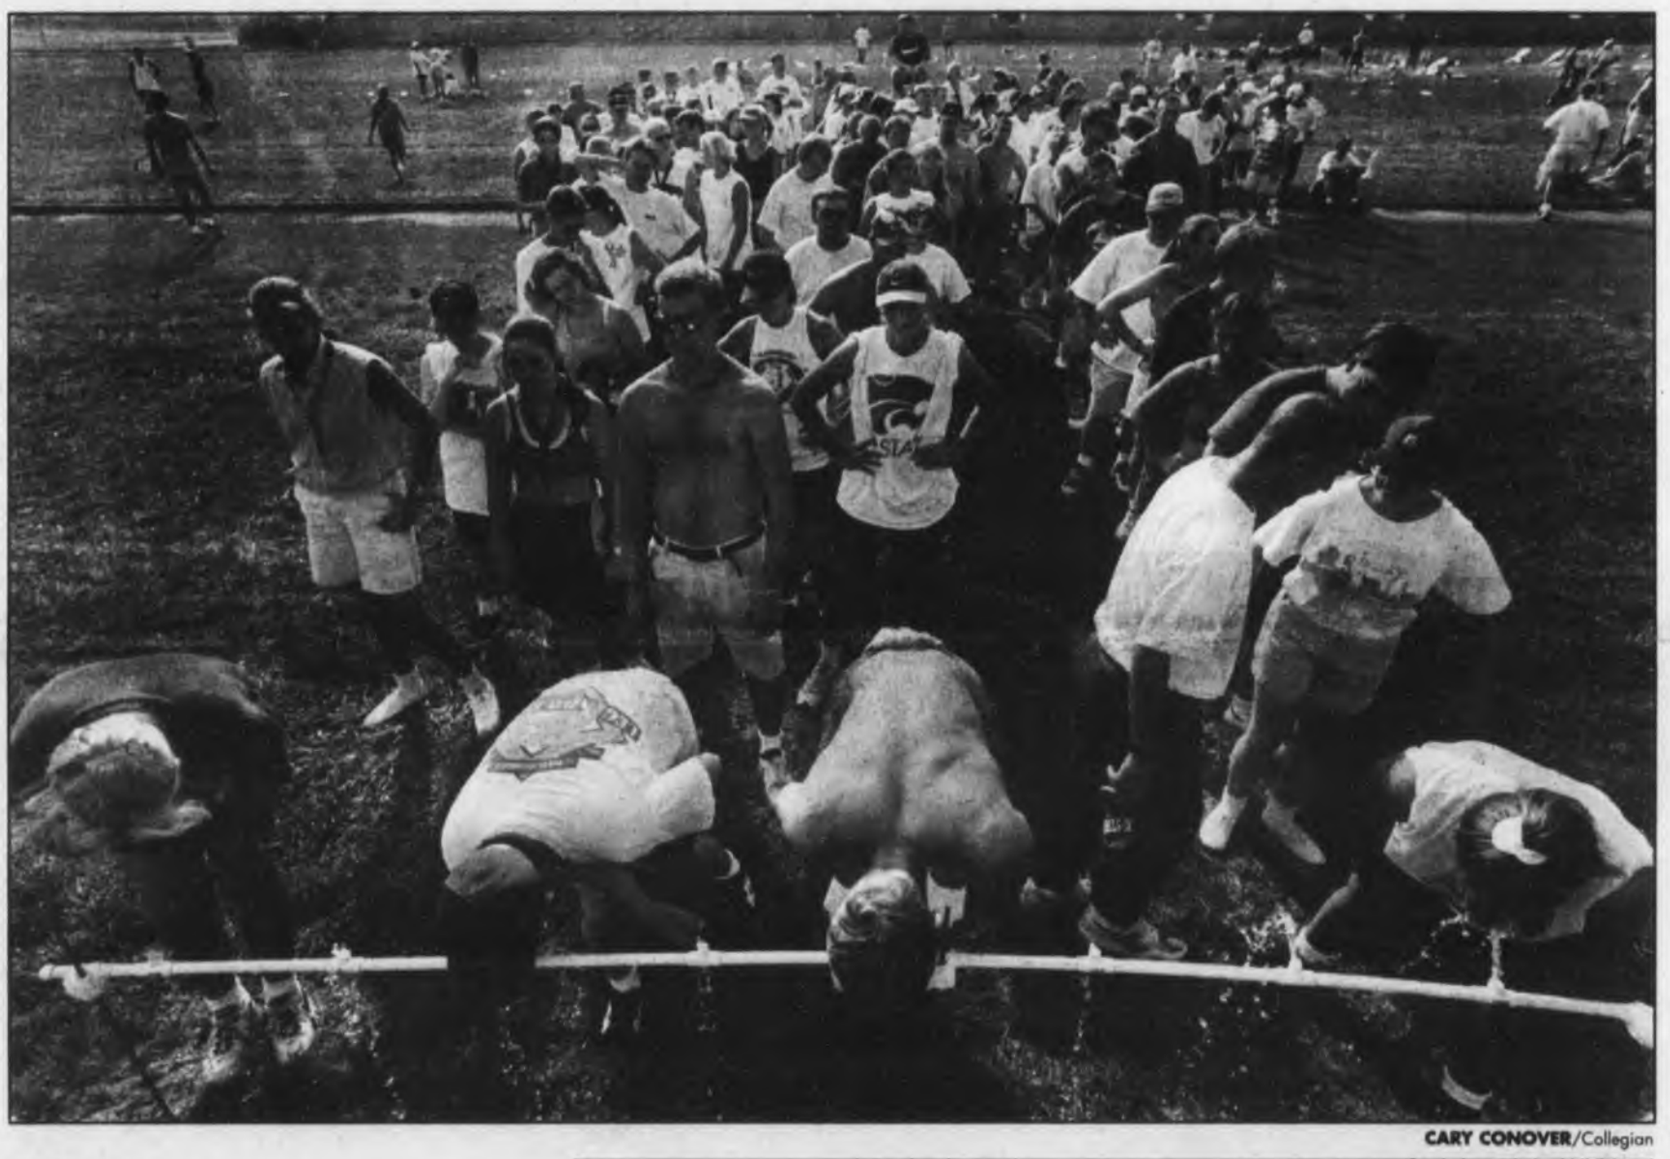
Terrorists convicted in bombing plots

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A Muslim militant who allegedly masterminded the World Trade Center bombing was convicted Thursday along with two other men of plotting to blow up 12 U.S. jetliners in a two-day campaign of terror.



Ramzi Yousef and his co-defendants, Abdul Hakim Murad and Wali Khan Amin Shah, face a mandatory sentence of life in prison Dec. 5. In addition, Yousef faces trial in the 1993 Trade Center bombing.

The three men showed no emotion and stared straight ahead upon hearing the verdicts, reached by the federal jury in its fourth day of deliberations.

"Each and every one of you got an extraordinarily fair trial," U.S. District Judge Kevin Duffy told the defendants.

The series of attacks was supposed to take place over Asia in 1995 but was never carried out. Prosecutors said the bombings would have killed 4,000 people in planes headed to Los Angeles, San Francisco, Honolulu and New York

Kassebaum to speak at McCain

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kansas, will inaugurate the 30th year of the Landon Lecture series at 10:30 a.m. Monday in McCain Auditorium.

The series was founded by her father, Gov. Alfred M. Landon, who was not only governor of Kansas, but also the Republican nominee for president in 1936 and an active participant in the national political scene.

Kassebaum took time out of her summer schedule to sit down and discuss her career and her future in the following July 30 interview.

Fortmeyer: Why are you retiring this fall?

Kassebaum: First, I've served 18 years, and that's quite a bit of time. I enjoy being chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee. It's given me a chance to be involved in a lot of legislation I care a lot about.

Unfortunately, it has become all too true, particularly in the last 10 years or so, a lot of it (legislation) has passed the Labor Committee. It's on the Senate calendar — some of it's been on the calendar for months — and our legislative days are very limited now. There's only about 25 or 23 legislative days left, and I think some of them (legislation) just aren't going to be considered.

SPEED

▶ Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kansas, will deliver a Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. Monday in McCain Auditorium.

In the new Congress, everything has to start over again. So it's with real frustration I watch what I think are some major efforts like job training reform — which I've spent four or five years on — be considered. That's discouraging.

I've enjoyed it, but I feel it's time to go back to the farm. I have five grandchildren with three more on the way, and I think it's time to help shepherd grandchildren around.

Fortmeyer: It's interesting, some critics say Bob Dole, if he were to retire, would probably stay in Washington. You've managed to stay connected to Kansas. How have you done this?

Kassebaum: It's just my roots are very much there. That is home base. I haven't been in Washington quite as long as Senator Dole. I think no matter where I would be or how long I would be away, I'd be wanting to come back to Kansas.

Fortmeyer: What do you plan to do once you get back to Kansas? Are you going to stay active in local, state or federal politics on some level?

Kassebaum: I'm sure I'll maintain an interest because I had it before I ever even thought of running for the Senate. I'm just very interested in public affairs and issues. I don't anticipate ever going back to running for office again.

Senate doles out money for UAB groups

SARAH LUNDAY
senior staff writer

Thousands of students will be affected by two bills passed at Student Senate Thursday night.

But most of them won't realize it.

The bills, which specify funding regulations for groups registered with the Union Activities Board, took more than two hours for Senate to pick through.

About 400 groups are registered with the UAB and are entitled to receive money from Senate, said Michelle Cooper, UAB chair and arts and sciences senator.

Many groups may not realize the benefits they can receive from UAB, Cooper said. Money allocated through Student Senate can fund three projects, Collegian advertising, films, renting office space, postage, travel, copies and more each semester.

"You can't do anything if you're not UAB-registered, because you don't have any money," Cooper said.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Sean Tomb said groups registered with UAB can receive up to $2,000 in informal allocation money from Senate each semester.

Last spring, only about 40 UAB groups requested money from Senate.

"I don't think people know the process," Tomb said, referring to the lack of groups asking for funding last spring.

Student Governing Association funding regulations for spring 1997 have altered slightly from last fall's regulations.

One change follows the lead of U.S. Congress members when they voted not to raise their own salaries, Tomb said. Senators voted to eliminate the use of student money to pay for Senate and College Council pictures that appear in the Royal Purple. In past years, about $100 of student reserve funds went to pay for these pictures.

"This sort of gets us out of our elitist attitude," Tomb said.

Senators also debated closely regulating groups who ask for travel money for conferences. Bret Glendening, Senate treasurer and agriculture senator, proposed an amendment to limit excessive

Committee votes 3-2 for property-tax relief

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Rep. Henry Helgerson, D-Wichita, proposed — and the Legislative Budget Committee narrowly endorsed — a plan to reduce the amount of money the state keeps in reserve and using the surplus for property-tax relief.

The vote on Thursday was 3-2 with committee chairman Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, abstaining.

Under Helgerson's motion, the committee would introduce a bill in the 1997 session to reduce to 4 percent from 7.5 percent the amount of general-fund expenditures the governor and Legislature must maintain as a general-fund balance when they construct the budget for the following fiscal year.

Based on this year's spending, that would make $122.5 million available, or 3.5 percent of the state general fund expenditures.

"This is a substantial chunk of money that we draw interest on that should be in the pockets of taxpayers," Helgerson said.

Helgerson's proposal would create a property-tax relief fund into which the excess reserve would be placed.

It would be up to the 1997 Legislature to decide how to dispense the money for reducing property taxes.

Helgerson said he envisions three options:

- Reduce the statewide school-finance property-tax levy, presently at 35 mills and scheduled to drop to 33 mills in 1997.
- Create a homestead exemption under which residential property owners would have the first $10,000 or $20,000 of the valuation on their property exempted from taxation.
- Create a companion property-tax exemption for small businesses, as an economic development stimulus.

Jennison and Salisbury opposed the plan on grounds the $122.5 million would be available to spend just one time, and putting it all into property-tax relief for 1997 would blow a hole in the state budget the next year.

The state has to make up from other sources any funding needed for public education that the statewide property tax does not generate.

The opponents also said it would force the state to issue more certificates of indebtedness — a mechanism by which the state borrows money from its other accounts to get the general fund through cash-flow problems.

More food options offered

CHAD HELIN
staff reporter

Students have new options and new rules to follow when eating at the K-State Student Union.

The Stateroom, the Union's biggest cafeteria, now offers the Slicers Deli, where students can create their own sandwich choosing from six meats and four types of salad.

By the end of September, the Stateroom plans to offer Freshens yogurt, Starbuck's coffee and Amigo's Express.

"We want to offer students a wide variety of quality food," Paul Stolle, director of food services, said.

Different hours will also affect the Stateroom. Because of limited business on the weekends, the Stateroom will be open from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Saturdays and from 12 to 5 p.m. on Sundays.

The lids-off rule is another new policy in effect. Students going through line to pay must take the lids off their refillable cups so employees can see inside.

"There are two reasons for this," Stolle said. "First, many drinks are offered that have different prices. And second, we've had a problem with some theft in the past."

Nancy Umscheid, food services employee, said the problem was getting out of hand.

"One day we counted the number of french fries that were put out compared to the number that went through the cash register," Umscheid said. "There were 52 boxes of fries that never went through."

Food is also served daily in Union Station and the Bluemont Room.

Within the next six months a franchise restaurant will take over Union Station. Stolle said a portion of student fees already go toward paying a franchise to move in.

"We're not sure what it will be, but we hope it will increase traffic in the Union," Stolle said.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Academic honesty policy should eliminate gray area

If you are caught cheating at K-State, there is a price to pay.

Unfortunately, there is a gray area concerning what that price might be.

Amid rumblings about establishing a board to enforce an honor system, students are still confused about what the punishment might be if they are caught copying answers for an exam or homework.

WHY WE CARE

The current system of determining what is cheating and how it will be punished is shaky. The new policy should be more concrete.

In some courses, particularly in the English department, there are more stringent — and varying — rules on how to quote and attribute sources in research papers.

And some professors don't mind if a student uses a paper already turned in for another course, while other instructors consider it punishable by failure.

The cheating and plagiarism guidelines in the student handbook need to be expanded so they apply to every course at K-State.

At present, instructors are at liberty to decide how individual cases of cheating or plagiarism are punished. A concrete policy on punishments would not only be fair, it would be a powerful deterrent.

If students knew there would be no cajoling or pleading after they were caught for offenses, they might think twice before leaning over a neighbor's shoulder when they can't decide between Botswana and Mozambique for the last answer on that geography final.

The more than 50 students caught cheating in the Principles of Biology class two years ago should be remembered.

They were punished, but for a while, nobody knew how severe it was going to be.

The student handbook is quoted in every syllabus, but most instructors simply refer students to the policy. Taking aside a few minutes in the first few days of class to explain exactly what can and cannot be construed as cheating would be beneficial, especially in introductory classes where transfer students and freshmen make up a lot of the roster.

Cheating makes K-State look bad, hampers the school's academic reputation and is unfair to those who earn degrees honestly. With a more definite, public anti-cheating policy, the phrase honor code carries more weight.

Coming to terms with racism, inequality requires acknowledging white skin color

MY

Page
GETZ

I have never in my life thought of myself as a racist. I have also never thought of myself as white. Until recently, it had never occurred to me that maybe not identifying myself as white was racist.

Now it makes sense to me that by not acknowledging the unwarranted benefits or access I take for granted as a white person, I was perpetuating racism through my obliviousness to my own white privilege.

In a reading in my application to women's studies class, I was distraught to read that to be white is to be racist.

I was more distraught that I was so flustered with defensiveness that I've spent virtually a week now reevaluating every encounter with racism as well as every relationship I have had with people of color both personally and as a group.

I thought, "I can't be racist. I cry when I read about the struggle of the civil-rights movement and the horrors of slavery. My first boyfriend was black, and I grew up in an ethnically diverse neighborhood."

My best friends as a child were Mexican and the only thing that meant to me was they got to eat tortillas and had piñatas at their birthday parties, which to me was something to be admired.

I had always felt a (prejudiced) loyalty toward black women because in junior high school the only faction of the socially segregated cliques that didn't think I was too strange to talk to happened to be black women.

I sifted through every example I could think of and finally found a fine line that separates where trying to be color-blind personally crosses into being color-blind politically, which creates a vulnerability to racism.

I can't remember being aware of race before my fourth-grade teacher split the class up one morning and made about a third of us sit at the back of the classroom and take a test while the others had free time. We weren't allowed to raise our hands to answer questions, had to stand at the end of the line and worst of all she seemed really angry at us.

At first we were curious, and we were waiting for a punch line or to find out what we had done wrong. By the end of the day I felt scared and alone. I thought I had done something terrible to deserve this, and I was afraid it was going to stay that way.

Finally, she had us sit down at what she called Pooh Corner. Incidentally, this time she didn't designate where we had to sit, but those of us who had been silenced all day sat quietly together in the back.

She told us those of us who had been silenced had done nothing wrong, but we were being treated differently because we all had blue eyes.

That is the day I learned about slavery, Martin Luther King Jr. and Rosa Parks. That was the first time it ever occurred to me that all grown-ups didn't always have the right to vote.This was the day I began to feel guilty for being white.

To medicate this guilt, I always thought that to train myself to be color-blind was the right thing to do.

To the contrary, the author of this reading claimed that to not acknowledge racial differences was to deny the plight of people of color by enabling the pretense of equality.

It is this assumption of equality that through obliviousness to one's own white privilege can be the perpetuator of inequality.

It is humbling to realize I am white.

It means regardless of my capacity for empathy, regardless of my anger at racism and the lack of representation of minorities and women in government, regardless of any parallels I've seen in classism, sexism, heterosexism and anti-semitism, I will never know what it means to be oppressed based on the color of my skin.

With the exception of gender, there is nothing in my appearance that I can't change in order to dodge discrimination. I can hide my differences simply by not dressing characteristically of the white-trash stereotype, or by enabling the security of other's assumptions that I am just a white, heterosexual, protestant, middle-class student.

This security is not a luxury for people of color. Until I recognized this privilege, I didn't see how silencing my class, sexuality or ethnic background or considering them a status comparable to those of color maintains racism, classism, sexism, anti-semitism and heterosexism.

I still believe we should treat each other with a blind equality not contingent on any of these differences. But not if it means being blind to the inequality that still exists. We can't end oppression if we refuse to see who is being oppressed.

How can we end color discrimination if we can't see color?

Apathy will get you nowhere

MY

Jeremy STEPHENS

As the country was gearing up for November elections this summer, I found myself taking on an attitude that was apathetic at best.

To anyone who knows me, this would sound strange, because I am generally well-known for my ability to start an argument with anyone when it comes to politics, even those who agree with me.

However, this summer, it really didn't matter to me, probably the same reason politics don't matter to most. It doesn't really matter.

It doesn't really matter who you elect. All politicians are crooked and evil, they just have different ways of going about it. As P.J. O'Rourke noted in "Parliament of Whores," Democrats destroy the environment and wreck the supply of affordable housing, but at least Republicans make a buck off it.

I am the same person who agonized when President Clinton won in 1992 and contemplated moving to another continent for four years. The same person who gloated in 1994 when the Republicans swept Congress for the first time in 40 years was the same person who this summer didn't care.

Obviously, I was going to vote for Bob Dole, but only because I perceived him as the lesser of all evils. However, it seems the total number of evils seems to be growing every election year.

My indifference lasted until Aug. 15. On that evening, I saw something that made me reconsider my apathy. I saw Dole's acceptance speech.

In less than an hour, I switched from an apathetic vote against Clinton to an energized vote for Dole. Now before you say I am just an old-fashioned partisan, let me finish.

In terms of delivery, Clinton could have done a better job than Dole, but his theatrical imperfections added to the power of the speech.

This speech was different from Clinton's though. It made you proud to be American, instead of just making you feel good. This speech was akin to the style and substance of President Reagan, who could rival Clinton in delivery.

Some people have made a comedic career out of belittling Dole, while others attack him for his stances, or his perceived stance on certain issues.

Many have maligned Dole as uncaring and mean. These are labels that mean little to me, because I would gladly support a mean person who would lower my taxes and secure domestic tranquility rather than a nice person who would raise my taxes in order to enlarge the class of people who are dependent on the government.

But the real issue is what Dole thinks, not what other people think he thinks. Let me illustrate with excerpts from his speech.

Many have questioned Dole's age, but he made a good point. He said, "Age has its advantages. ... And to those who say that it was never so, that America's not been better, I say you're wrong. And I know because I was there. And I have seen it. And I remember."

On the regulation of business and the value of freedom of commerce, he said, "The freedom of the marketplace is not merely the best guarantor of our prosperity. It is the chief guarantor of our rights, and a government that seizes control of the economy for the good of the people ends up seizing control of the people for the good of the economy."

On the issue of ethnicity and discrimination thereof, he said, "But if there's anyone who has mistakenly attached themselves to our party in the belief that we are not open to citizens of every race and religion, then let me remind you, tonight this hall belongs to the party of Lincoln. And the exits, which are clearly marked, are for you to walk out as I stand this ground without compromise."

I encourage you to take a look at the speech at (http://www.c-span.org) and in text at (http://www.dole96.com), in the hopes it will end your apathy, whether you agree with me or not.

The important thing is to find something that motivates you to get involved in politics, because it plays a large part in your future. You pay taxes, so the least you can do is vote.

Remember, voter apathy is not a family value.

Taking a moral stance

Editor,

I am writing in regard to Russell Fortmeyer's, "Twisted Morals." I agree with his general argument, but disagree with his method of conveying his point. He never firmly states his position.

From the start of his essay, he hits upon the points of escape from reality and the consequent social problems. He asks the reader, "Can one blame young people for pursuing their desire to hook up with a new friend or lover? Can one blame students for wanting to escape, even for one night, the reality of life, class and other demands?"

The answer is yes, I can blame them, and I openly do. It is not the fact that they pursue their desires, but precisely what they choose to desire. Purposely, forfeited rationality does not free one from blame.

Fortmeyer's moral middle-of-the-road stance on this polemic issue is what allows it to continue. Who wins when you abdicate passing moral judgments, the good or the evil? Where since equals compliance we must speak out in defense of what is right.

To quote philosopher Nathan Branden, from his essay "Psychology of Pleasure" in the Ayn Rand book, "The Virtue of Selfishness," "The 'pleasure' of being drunk is obviously the pleasure of escaping consciousness. And so are the kind of social gatherings held for no other purpose than the expression of hysterical chaos, where the guests wander around in an alcoholic stupor, prattling noisily and senselessly, and enjoying the illusion of a universe where one is not burdened with purpose, logic, reality or awareness."

You're right. we owe it to ourselves to seek more positive means of entertainment. We also owe it to ourselves to cast blame on the guilty, and not silently sanction such behavior. If we don't, who will? The guilty will remain free to continue down a path of self-destruction in the name of their desires.

In closing, I would like to quote from a song about this very same topic by the Swedish hardcore band, Refuse, "Kill the conscious, lies over lives."

Purity of the mind and body, to keep the resistance moving on.

Academic honesty

Editor,

Please thank R.J. Diepenbrock for his fine article on the Provost's Task Force on Academic Honesty. I was delighted to read an accurate reporting.

I neglected to mention that the provost's task force was a combination of students, faculty and administrators. The students played an integral role in the task force's deliberations and final recommendations. It was the student members of the committee, above all, who were supportive of a new system that could possibly improve the climate of honesty on campus.

Tenants can easily misconstrue leases, get burned later on Roommate horror stories are commonly heard on college campuses. Some of these stories are about personality differences or living conflicts.

The rest of the horror stories are more severe, because they involve the finances and legalities of signing a lease with roommates.

Sarah, a sophomore in social work who asked that her last name be withheld for legal reasons, is suing the apartment complex she lived in last semester, because after she moved out her roommate left the apartment damaged and uncleaned, and the complex is trying to keep her deposit to pay for it.

She is being held responsible for this even though she had already moved out, and the lease had expired.

"After that happened, I decided to live by myself from now on, so I don't have to deal with roommate problems anymore," Sarah said.

Robyn Rakowsky, junior in human development, had a roommate who moved out three months into the year-long lease they signed.

"I ended up having to pay money to change the lease after she moved out, and she didn't pay me back for a long time. Even though she was the one that left, I had to take responsibility for her actions," Rakowsky said.

Dave Field, junior in computer science, had a roommate who moved out before their lease expired and had to pay a certain amount of money in order to be able to stay in the apartment.

"Either I paid the money or I got kicked out, so I had no choice. I won't go into a lease again in which I am bound by what my roommates owe for their portion of the rent," Field said.

"I would only be involved in a lease if each roommate was individually responsible for their share."

Managers of apartment complexes around Manhattan that frequently rent to college students said they have problems with roommates abandoning leases.

This leaves the other roommates responsible for finding a replacement to move in and take over that portion of the rent. This is called subleasing.

Cornell Mayfield, director of human resources at the Department of Human Resources in Manhattan, said there is some research involved before moving in and sharing a lease with someone.

Mayfield said the most important thing is to choose someone you are compatible with and who is aware of the responsibilities and obligations involved in a lease.

Before looking for an apartment, it is important to go to the Office of Student Activities and Services on campus and look over the handbook on leases to make sure everything in your lease is clear.

"Read the lease carefully, and do not rush into it," Mayfield said. "Roommates are jointly and separately liable when each party signs a lease."

If something happens and one roommate leaves the other to deal with the rent, that roommate will have to sue the other for the others' portion of the rent.

Often it isn't possible to foresee personality conflicts.

Roommates can avoid financial conflicts if they are aware of their responsibilities to uphold the lease, even if they don't end up staying until the lease expires.

Christian fellowship to celebrate 50 years

KENNY WENTWORTH
staff writer

As the weekend draws near, anticipation for the celebration of the birthday of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship grows by the minute.

The group is celebrating 50 years of existence on the K-State campus.

As a part of the festivities, Steve Hayner, ICF national president, will be addressing students and returning alumni Friday at All Faiths Chapel. His presentation will be based on the faithfulness of God, and how he is working in the lives of students and ICF.

"Steve Hayner is so alive and fun in person. He will have a good message to say," Adrian Sealine, junior in agricultural business, said.

The group will continue the celebration Saturday with a brunch and formal meeting with Hayner and an afternoon picnic, and it will close the weekend by attending the football game that night.

The weekend has been in the making for the last year and will be worth attending, Stephanie Moser, former ICF staff worker, said.

"We have been organizing it for probably a year. At this point, around 70 alumni are going to be coming back for the weekend. Some of them were here in the 1940s when the group started. That is really exciting," Moser said.

ICF is a non-denominational, student-run group open to anyone. It involves students who want to share in their faith.

They meet on Friday nights in Throckmorton Hall as a large group. The meetings usually consist of a speaker from around the area. On weeknights, smaller groups get together and discuss the Bible or other aspects of Christianity.

Jimmy Goheen, ICF president, said he feels his participation in the group has helped him grow.

"First of all it has strengthened my relationship with God. I have also met a lot of friends, and it has given me the chance to be in a leadership position. It is all about living as a Christian," Goheen said.

Happy birthday, ICF

The InterVarsity Christian Fellowship will celebrate 50 years on the K-State campus this weekend with a series of activities.

7:30 tonight – large group session with speaker Steve Hayner.

9:30 a.m. Sat. – brunch and formal meeting with Steve Hayner in the K-State Student Union.

1-5 p.m. Sat. – ICF picnic at City Park.

6:30 p.m. Sat. – ICF will attend the K-State vs. Indiana State game.

■ The Indiana St. Sycamores visit Manhattan with one goal in mind: to win.

TODD STEWART
sports writer

Bill Snyder tried his best to get out of this game, but Indiana State just would not let him.

That leaves K-State in a game Saturday with nothing to gain and everything to lose.

Current NCAA Division I-A rules state a team must have victories over six Division I-A programs to qualify for a postseason bowl, but the the Sycamores have I-AA status.

So, at least in the eyes of the bowl committees, this game will not count toward K-State's required six victories.

Sycamore coach Dennis said he understands Snyder's concern and previous desires to get out of the game with Indiana State.

"With the six-win rule for I-A teams to get into a bowl, most teams would have thoughts of getting out of a game against a I-AA," Raetz said.

Snyder said K-State tried to get out of the game and was close to getting a deal made with another school, but the plans never got finalized.

"We got relatively close. It just didn't work out," Snyder said.

He said he knows it is a big-money game for I-AA schools, but said it just was not in his team's best interest and that of K-State.

Raetz said playing a tough I-A school is something the Sycamores traditionally do.

"Games like this are essential. Year in and year out we've played money games," Raetz said. "This is something we have to do. It is a fact of life that we're going to do this."

Snyder would not say how much Indiana State will receive for the game but said it was substantial.

Now that the game is set, however, Snyder said the money is nothing to talk about.

"They have 65-70 guys coming here. They're not coming for a paycheck," Snyder said. "They're coming to play."

Raetz said even though his team has played tough I-A schools, he knows his players are in for a challenge Saturday against nationally ranked K-State.

"Over the years, the biggest thing you have to do is play extremely well, or you're going to be embarrassed," Raetz said. "K-State is about as good a team as any team we've ever played."

Women's team lacks seniors, not leadership

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

The K-State women's golf team will begin its fall season this weekend at the Chip N' Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

Led by second-year coach Kristi Knight, the women's squad is looking ahead to a new year in a new conference.

"The Big 12 is going to be very competitive," Knight said. "There are some really tough schools that have been added to the conference."

Included in that group are powerhouses Texas and Texas Tech, schools that finished in the top 20 last season. Knight said she expects both programs to be tough again this season.

The team will head into the season with no seniors. But the lack of seniority isn't a concern, she said.

"We had four sophomores that traveled with the team last season," Knight said.

With no seniors, Knight is looking at junior Ann Slater to be the leader of the team this season. Slater played in the top two positions throughout the season last year, and Knight said she's a strong force on the team.

But Knight said there's more to Slater than her talent.

"She's just a great person. She's good in the classroom, and she really helps out the younger players off the course," Knight said.

Also looking to make an effect on the Wildcats' chances to do well at the invitational this weekend will be freshman recruits Kelly Johnson and Carrie Chambers.

Chambers finished second in the Oklahoma 4A State Championships. Johnson finished second in the Kansas 6A State Championships.

"I'm expecting both of them to come in and travel with the team this year," Knight said. "I'm looking for them to come in and be very competitive throughout the year."

The squad will complete play at the Chip N' Invitational Tuesday.

The final round of the annual Sig Ep Shootout will be at 6 p.m. today at Stagg Hill Golf Course.

The Shootout is a closest-to-the-pin tournament. The qualifying rounds took place at four different courses in the Manhattan area. The participants who had the three closest shots to the hole at each course moved on to the final round.

The 12 qualifying golfers will have three shots each on the 17th hole of the course.

There is more than $500 in cash and prizes available to all 12 golfers, including a 1997 Chevrolet Camaro from Murdock Auto Mall for any golfer who hits a hole-in-one.

SHOOT

▶ The final round of the Sig Ep Shootout will be tonight at 6 at Stagg Hill Golf Course at the 17th hole. Twelve golfers will compete for more than $500 in cash and prizes.

Ninety percent of Sigma Phi Epsilon's philanthropy proceeds will go to the Big Lakes Developmental Center in Manhattan. The other 10 percent of the money will be split between the junior golf programs of the four participating courses.

The money was raised in the qualifying rounds of the shootout, which began Aug. 24-25 and continued Sept. 1-2.

When golfers arrived at the par-3 holes on the course, they could wager from $1 to $10 that they could hit the ball on the green in one shot.

If the golfers did hit the ball on the green, the Sig Eps matched the bet. If the golfers missed the green, they lost their bet. That money was put toward the proceeds.

Netters to put perfect record on line at Rice

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

K-State will try to keep its winnning way this weekend, putting its undefeated record on the line at the Rice Invitational Tournament in Houston.

The Wildcats, 4-0, will face Rice on Friday and No. 15 Ohio State and Oregon on Saturday.

This will be the Cats second meeting with Rice this season. They defeated the Owls last weekend at the Northwestern Invitational, 3-1.

Coach Jim Moore said none of the upcoming games will be easy.

"Rice will be playing at their place, and I'm sure they'll be tougher," Moore said. "They're all going to be important matches."

Moore said he wasn't sure if his team was ready to play the 15th-ranked team in the nation.

"We'll find out if we're ready," Moore said. "It's important that we play a team like theirs, and it's something we need to do. We just need to be smart and patient.

"The biggest thing right now will still be to take care of ourselves," he said.

Oregon, who went 8-21 a year ago, is not a sure win for the Cats.

"They're the last team we face in the tournament, and they're from the PAC-10," Moore said. "No matter where you are in the PAC-10, you're still a good ball club."

Although starting the season off with two tournament sweeps would be a nice thing, keeping the team undefeated this weekend isn't the most important thing to Moore.

"It's not necessarily the case that we win every game this weekend," Moore said.

"The biggest thing is confidence — not just winning but coming out believing in ourselves."

Cowboys, Steelers will not return to Super Bowl, but Chiefs, '49ers will Week one of the NFL season has come and gone. What can be seen from just one week of football?

I see lots of things.

Let's start with the two teams that played in the last game last year in Arizona — Dallas and Pittsburgh.

A lot of people think the Cowboys are in trouble because of key losses like Michael Irvin and Jay Novacek. They are mistaken. The Cowboys' problems actually started during the preseason.

Not once did the Super Bowl champions have a solid, productive preseason game.

The fact is, blame or excuses shouldn't be put on players' being gone. Instead, the blame should be put on the coach.

Shane MCCORMICK

Barry Switzer did not get these players ready for the regular season.

Sources out of Dallas said that Switzer canceled practices many times during spring training.

Instead of taking charge and getting after players (like a former Cowboy coach did), Switzer is constantly looking over his back.

He is too worried about what players might think of his decisions.

Yes, the losses of Novacek and Irvin hurt the team, but give the Chicago Bears the credit they deserve.

The Bears played a tremendous game, especially on the defensive side of the ball.

Once again, Switzer was out-coached in a key, big game. Switzer's inept coaching ability, not the team's off-the-field activities, is what could take this team down.

The Steelers started off their 1996 campaign with Jim Miller as their starting quarterback. That should have been a sign of bad things to come.

Miller struggled throughout the game and was eventually replaced by Mike Tomzack and Kordell Stewart.

The Steelers eventually fell to Jacksonville.

Tomzack has been named the starter for Sunday's game. I'll bet he won't make it through the entire game. Until Bill Cowher decides to play Kordell at quarterback the whole season, this offense will be average.

Having an average Steeler offense was once considered OK, because it had a great defense to back it up. But no longer do the Steelers have a great defense to do that.

Rod Woodson has yet to return to the all-pro form he had before his injury. Many times last Sunday, Woodson was beat easily by Jacksonville wide receivers. In the off-season, the Steelers lost tremendous pass rusher Kevin Greene to the Carolina Panthers.

> Having an average Steeler offense once was considered OK, because it had a great defense to back it up. But no longer do the Steelers have a great defense to do that.

To add injury to insult, the Steelers have lost Greg Lloyd for the entire season. Just like Woodson last year, Lloyd ended his season during the first game of the year.

So what about the rest of the league?There were some teams that picked up wins, such as Minnesota, but don't get too excited over them.

Yes, the Vikings picked up a close win against Detroit, but it's only a matter of time before this team crumbles.

It's always a concern whether Warren Moon will make it through an entire game.

And Brad Johnson is not going to cut it for any long period. I mean, even Chad May could have hit Chris Carter in the end zone against the Lions.

Don't expect a playoff appearance this year, Vikings fans.

Another team that shouldn't get too excited about its first victory is the Denver Broncos. I've seen some kids playing in a sandlot that could beat the New York Jets.

If John Elway makes it through the entire season, the Broncos should finish up at 8-8 or 9-7. In the pathetic AFC conference, that will be good enough to make it into the playoffs.

So who looked good enough to make it to the big game in January?

It won't be the two teams that were there last year. The Cowboys and Steelers are headed in the wrong direction.

Four or five losses early on will cost them the home-field advantage. Without it, neither should make it to the Super Bowl.

My pick for the AFC has to be the Kansas City Chiefs. One, the Chiefs are without a doubt the deepest team in the NFL. Two, look what the Chiefs did last year with Lin Elliot as their kicker. Just imagine what can be done with a consistent Pete Stoyanovich.

In the NFC, the San Francisco 49ers should beat the Cowboys or the Packers in the NFC Championship game.

The Niners have a cupcake schedule that will allow them to get the home-field advantage throughout the playoffs. The return of fullback William Floyd during the season will give the team a major boost.

The score: San Francisco 44, Kansas City 13.

First meet prepares athletes for future meets

SHANA NEWELL

The K-State cross country team opens its season Saturday at the Wildcat Invitational, hosted by Baker University in Baldwin.

Coach Terry Drake said he uses the meet as an opportunity to allow the younger runners to gain some experience at the collegiate level.

"A lot of the runners competed in high school ,where they were way better than most of the others, leaving them behind," Drake said. "I want them to be prepared to run with a pack of runners."

Vanity plays a part in Drake's preparedness agenda. Some athletes are not used to competing with the cross country shorts and might feel self-conscious, Drake said. This first meet is an opportunity for those runners to lose that self-consciousness. When they do that, he said, they'll be ready to concentrate on running in their later meets.

Both the men's and women's teams will be competing at the Wildcat Invitational. For both squads, it will be the first opportunity for the athletes to run together as a team.

"The first few meets are incredibly important in allowing the runners to get used to each other, to prepare them for the bigger competitions," Drake said.

Surgery sidelines Montgomery

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jeff Montgomery, Kansas City's career-saves leader, is expected to return to the Royals next spring, because arthroscopic surgery indicated a little more damage to his shoulder than previously thought.

Montgomery underwent the procedure Wednesday by Dr. Steve Joyce, the Royals' team physician.

"He had a bone-spur impingement that was shaved or removed, a partial rotator cuff tear and fraying of the labrum," said general manager Herk Robinson.

"It's a little more extensive than what the MRI showed."

Montgomery had been uncharacteristically ineffective, with 10 blown saves and a 4.26 ERA this year.

Robinson said Montgomery's condition was not believed career-threatening.

"Something like this used to be more serious than it is now," he said.

"With the new technology today, all that has changed. I won't say it's commonplace. But it's anticipated he'll be back and be able to pitch by opening day."

Montgomery, 34, has been bothered on and off for three years by an inflammation of the bursa, a fluid-filled sac at the tip of the shoulder.

The failure to follow through on a pitch often caused the ball to hang high over the plate. This season, Montgomery gave up 14 homers in 63 1-3 innings, compared with seven in 65 2-3 innings last year.

Earlier this year he passed Dan Quisenberry for No. 1 on the Royals career-saves list. His 24 this year brought his total to 242.

Montgomery's ERA of 4.26 is the highest of his career. He has recorded 24 saves in 34 opportunities — his highest number of blown saves since he became the Royals' full-time closer in 1990. In 1995, he had 31 saves in 38 opportunities.

"There was never any question that he was going to need a shoulder probe at the end of this season," Robinson said. "But he was going to try to pitch through it 'til the end of the year. It's good we did it early. This will give him every chance to come back."

Coaches impressed by free agent Washington

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — When Oakland tight end Rickey Dudley makes his first trip to Arrowhead Stadium on Sunday, he'll be facing a strong safety of rare skill.

So rare, in fact, that Marty Schottenheimer said he's never been around a better one.

"Brian Washington is the best strong safety I've ever been associated with as a coach," the boss of the Kansas City Chiefs said this week. "He's a big, strong, physical guy who likes to play aggressively."

Washington, a 6'1", 210-pounder, spent five years with the New York Jets before the Chiefs signed him last year as an unrestricted free agent. He's one reason Kansas City's defense blossomed last year into one of the NFL's finest.

After reviewing films of the Chiefs' 20-19 victory last week at Houston, coaches found only one defensive player who had tackled well.

"Brian Washington tackled great," Schottenheimer said. "He was outstanding."

K-State offers jobs via online services

ASHLEY WEEKLY
staff reporter

Students are entitled to employer referrals, current job openings, and on-campus interviews when they complete the disc registration offered by Career and Employment Services.

Tracey Fraser, director of CES, said she feels registration is geared to serve all students.

"Registration is an access to many helping skills," Fraser said. "We advocate teaching someone the life skills they need to start the job search."

CES registration is started and maintained through the use of a computer disc. The materials and disc can be purchased in Holtz Hall for $7.

The information on the disc is contained on five screens. It usually takes about 30 minutes to complete and can be completed on any IBM-compatible computer.

Ed O'Malley, senior in history, decided to register to see what jobs and opportunities were available. O'Malley found the computer personal profile easy.

"It's kind of like a résumé. There are just a lot more questions. Basically, it is just like an electronic résumé," O'Malley said.

After the disc is completed, it must be returned to CES to be entered in the database.

Fraser said the Job Search Program helps employers locate students seeking jobs by looking at different parameters.

The Job Search Program enables employers to locate students by demographics, majors, minors, skills and experience through the database.

Employers have access to every disc in the database by use of their own computer and check it daily for new registrants. Registrants keep their profile updated according to their activities and achievements.

Registrants can also acquire jobs by using JOBLine. Students can achieve access to JOBLine through the World Wide Web. Updated daily, JOBLine contains on- and off-campus employment, part- and full-time jobs, internships, and summer job opportunities. JOBLine can be accessed at (http://www.ksu.edu/ces/ces.html).

CES registrants also can take part in on-campus interviews. Once each semester employers seeking candidates for positions and internships visit campus. About 350 employers interview students each semester.

On-campus interview sign-up begins Monday in Holtz Hall. Interviews will begin Sept. 30.

CES will be involved in the KSU Career Fair Sept. 17 in the K-State Student Union. If students are registered with CES by Sept. 12, their disc will be downloaded off the CES computer database and given to all employers attending the Career Fair.

Registration with CES has been available for several years. More than 2,000 students are in the database.

Fraser said registration requires little time from students. She said once their discs are completed students have no other obligations. Fraser encouraged students of all ages and majors to register with the office throughout the year.

Holtz Hall is open 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Student program grows, allows more exchanges

HEATHER HJETLAND
staff reporter

The Czech Republic Exchange Program has been expanded to 28 students this year due to a contribution.

The contribution was from Joseph and Elizabeth Barton-Dobenin. Joseph Dobenin, a retired faculty member in the College of Business Administration, left Czechoslovakia as a refugee in the 1940s.

In 1991, after the revolution, his family's properties were restored to him. Dobenin then established scholarships for students to study abroad.

Fourteen students from each country are involved in the exchange. Four K-State students left for Prague this month, and three students from Czech Tech came to K-State.

William Richter, assistant provost of international affairs, said this program began five years ago when George Strecker, professor of mathematics, initiated an exchange agreement with Czech Republic schools.

Three years ago, K-State began exchanging one student per year or semester with Charles University. This is the first year K-State will exchange with Czech Tech.

As a result of the $15,000 donation, $750 semester scholarships will be awarded. The scholarships will be divided between K-State, Czech Tech and Charles University students.

Other students can be accepted into the exchange without scholarships.

Students were selected on the basis of an application, two recommendations, a one-page summary of their intentions and why they would be a good person to go to Prague.

"It's really easy. I don't know why more people don't go," said Keri Konold-Crittenden, 1996 graduate in anthropology, who will study at Charles.

"Even without the scholarship, it's a great deal, but with the scholarship, it's an even better deal," Richter said.

Barry Michie, study-abroad director, said the scholarships and the large number of courses in Prague that are taught in English sparked an interest in the program this year.

"What is so neat about the program in Prague is that Charles is a great medieval university in Europe, and Czech Tech has a reputation of being a top engineering and architecture school," Michie said.

Students going to Czech Tech can study engineering and architecture. Those at Charles University can study arts, social sciences, law and medicine.

"Prague is a marvelous place for architecture students to go because it escaped the destruction of World War II," Michie said.

"We are really excited about going to Prague and were told that it was one of the most beautiful cities in Europe," Konold-Crittenden said about going on the exchange with her husband, Brent Crittenden, senior in architecture.

Czech Tech students Petr Burian, sophomore in engineering; Jan Pika, junior in engineering; and Marcel Janda, senior in engineering, are studying at K-State this semester.

"I think I will benefit in many ways," Janda said, "not only from what I learn in school, but also from American culture and other foreign students."

Five more students from Czech Tech and six Charles University students will come to K-State in the spring. Ten K-State students will leave for Prague in the spring.

In support of the Czech Republic Exchange, UFM is offering Czechoslovakian language classes. There is an organizational meeting at 6:30 p.m. Monday in Eisenhower 016. Survival skills, a one-hour class, is offered for $62.50. Beginning Czechoslovakian language, a three-hour course, costs $190. Burian will teach the classes.

Beach sculpture welcomes visitors to art museum's campus entrance

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

Marianna Kistler Beach will greet every visitor to the art museum named after her.

A bust of Beach will be just inside the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art's campus entrance, which faces McCain Auditorium and All Faiths Chapel.

The sculpture will face into the art museum and be about four feet from the bay window facing All Faiths. It will also be visible from outside.

"I don't think you can get in and out of the building without seeing it, unless you have tunnel vision," sculptor Richard Bergen said.

Bergen said he incorporated the pedestal into the bust.

Nelson Britt, director of the Beach art museum, said, "What I told him is that I didn't want just a bust sitting on top of a box. I told him I wanted the pedestal to be part of the bust, so the pedestal is an extension of the bust."

Bergen said the foot of the pedestal is made of black African granite, which he chose because Beach and her husband, Ross, have traveled to Africa.

Before he began sculpting, Bergen photographed Beach at the Beaches' ranch in Hays.

"I used those pictures. Plus, I got pictures of her when she was in college, when she was a young woman, when she was middle-aged," he said.

He created a composite of Beach from these photographs.

"I took characteristics from each age. My idea was that people who knew her at any time in her life would see it and recognize her," he said.

> "I don't think you can get in and out of the building without seeing it, unless you have tunnel vision."
> • RICHARD BERGEN, SCULPTOR

The bust will be cast in bronze. Bergen said he likes to work with bronze because of its permanency. He said 3,000- or 4,000-year-old bronze sculptures look new.

Britt started researching the possibility of a bronze sculpture in February or March. He chose Bergen in May after considering two other sculptors.

"I had a deadline to meet, so I went right to work on it," Bergen said.

The bust will be installed Sept. 24. After that, the museum will be closed to the public. More sculptures will be installed Oct. 1. The museum will open Oct. 13.

Assistant professor's art reveals spontaneous side

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

If you're an artist, or lover of art, in Manhattan, you've probably run into Terri T. Schmidt somewhere, sometime for some reason or another.

Maybe you were drinking coffee at Espresso Royale Caffe when she was helping a student hang a show. It could have been in the Willard Gallery during a bachelor of fine arts show opening. More than likely, it was at the Manhattan Center for the Arts, where a retrospective of her work has opened this past weekend.

"Among Friends: New and Old Works on Paper '72-'96," through Sept. 27, is like looking through Schmidt's family photo album. It is a big family portrait in the guise of an art show.

Each pencil drawing, monotype and lithograph is a portrait of an acquaintance, a life-long friend or a family member. Schmidt said many of the pieces were done quickly — the spontaneity shows remarkably in the poses and facial expressions of the sitters.

Art Show Information
"Among Friends: New and Old Works on Paper '72-'96," a show by artist Terri T. Schmidt, will be at the Manhattan Center for the Arts until Sept. 27. Hours are 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

It's sometimes difficult to distinguish when each work was made because Schmidt's basic style has changed only subtly, although it takes on many configurations when used in differing media.

"I like lines and the way contour defines shape," Schmidt, assistant professor of art, said. "Much more than I like color and texture."

There is an absence of color in a majority of Schmidt's work, although she said she is exploring it with her very recent work, which didn't make it into the show. But this lack of color only makes one doubly notice the variety of hues black and white can produce with a capable artist.

This quality is superbly noticeable in "Nightwomen," 1995, a portrait of a woman in black hose and underwear sitting on what appear to be springs. Schmidt drew the portrait in one of her classes. It deftly walks a line between representation and abstraction, or in Schmidt's words: "I let my imagination get carried away."

"Children love my drawings because they are scribbly," she said. "They loved the fact I was allowed to scribble."

"Even though my work is quite representational, I like abstraction," she said. "If I had huge bodies of time to move beyond representation, my work would be more abstract."

Schmidt last took a sabbatical in 1986, which is why many of the pieces date from this time. She hopes for another sabbatical next year.

However, when Schmidt discusses her work she invariably focuses on the personal history behind each portrait. It is, after all, a show of her friends.

"I tend to be a little sentimental with drawing," Schmidt said. "It's a personal thing. These marvelous people have rich backgrounds. I try to catch the essence of their history."

One could literally spend hours deciphering the personalities of each portrait, but maybe you know one of the subjects. Art students will recognize Margo Kren, associate professor of art, in two portraits.

"There are images that come from fears, images from sentimental responses — all the emotions human beings are capable of," Schmidt said.

Nichols Theatre transformed into lodge

■ What used to be Nichols Theatre has been transformed into a rustic lodge equipped with a wood-burning stove.

ABBI HAKE
staff writer

Nichols Theatre's metamorphosis happened for the returning summer play, "The Foreigner," presented by K-State Theatre.

The play's coarse, yet realistic se,t is only part of what made "The Foreigner" delightful.

A comedy, written by Larry Shue and copyrighted in 1983, deals with one general theme and approaches others.

The central theme revolves around Charlie Baker, played by a talented Shad V. Bever.

Bever ceases to be his old self and evolves into an outgoing person whom he likes much more.

He plays a convincing character, both as a shy, restrictive individual and as an outgoing, flamboyant character.

This is a tribute to Bever's extraordinary acting ability.

Bever is an actor within an actor as he first convinces the audience that he is his character, Charlie Baker, and then manages to convince the audience and the other characters that he is the foreigner.

Within the plot, though, Charlie is not really the foreigner.

He and his friend, Sgt. Froggy LeSeur, played by Jason Miller, only pretend he is so Baker does not have to talk to anyone, thus preserving his much-desired solitude.

> "Charlie likes himself more every second and begins to make friends, possibly for the first time in his life, with Ellard Simms and Betty Meeks."

What results from their scheme is exactly opposite of what Charlie planned.

In an attempt to communicate with his fellow lodge mates, Charlie frees himself as he falls in love with his new personality.

Before his stay at the lodge he was expected to act dignified and smart.

As the foreigner, though, everyone thought he was funny and unusual.

Charlie likes himself more every second and begins to make friends, probably for the first time in his life, with Ellard Simms and Betty Meeks. He even manages to find love in the end.

It is interesting to watch Bever make this skillful transition. Part of his effectiveness can be attributed to the six other characters.

Miller is a convincing soldier and friend to Charlie. He walks with his shoulders back, reeking of confidence.

Although its not clearly stated, Froggy seems to have planned Charlie's transformation.

Besides Charlie, Betty Meeks, played by Jill Huguet, is one of the funniest characters.

She's an old, hunchbacked woman who screams at Charlie in hopes that louder-spoken English will make it more understandable to the foreigner.

"The Foreigner" isn't all comedy, though. Toward the end, racism plays a part.

Owen Musser, played by Doug Hurley, a leader of the Ku Klux Klan, traps Rev. David Marshal Lee, played by Toby Denning, into his group, and they move to target the foreigner.

Despite this issue, "The Foreigner" is truly a comedy.

The actors and actresses appear to be veterans of the stage. They are comfortable and interact with one another skillfully.

Aside from the talented cast, though, the production side has some questionable qualities, yet they fail to seriously flaw the play itself.

Garth Brooks' "Friends in Low Places" is clumsily placed between scenes and acts producing an awkward transition.

The time period in which the play takes place is also shady.

The old, rustic lodge makes the setting seem somewhat dated, but the Guess jeans and references to answering machines make it unidentifiable.

All in all, Nichols Theatre's rustic lodge is worth visiting this weekend.

Shue's brilliance shines through the spoken words of his play and through the detail that accompanies it.

This is one of K-State's funniest and most captivating performances.

"The Foreigner" finishes its second appearance tonight and Saturday at 8 p.m.

Fishing clinic to provide children alternative to drugs

SPEED

The Tuttle Creek Lake Association will sponsor the Youth Fishing Clinic on Sept. 21 as a way to promote good times without drugs, alcohol or gangs.

KELLY FURNAS
staff writer

Two hundred children from the Manhattan area will go fishing Sept. 21.

The Youth Fishing Clinic promotes the idea that they can have a good time without drugs, alcohol or gangs, said Ed Phelps, president of the Tuttle Creek Lake Association.

The clinic, which is put on annually by the Tuttle Creek Lake Association, teaches 8- to 12-year-old children how to fish safely and effectively.

"At the beginning of the clinic, we show them a film, 'Hooked on Fishing. Not on Drugs,'" Phelps said. "After that we don't mention drugs again. We want them to learn how to have a good time and appreciate nature."

> "Last year I thought, 'Hey, my kids would really enjoy this. It's great seeing all of those kids out there.
> • MICHAEL DOLAN
> JUNIOR IN PUBLIC RELATIONS

The clinic begins at 7 p.m. Sept. 20, with the children alternating through the classes on how to catch certain fish.

"We've brought in some of the best the state has to offer," Phelps said of the teachers. "We have a class on safety and six classes on catching fish."

Participants will then test their rods and reels, which are provided by Zebco, a fishing-supply manufacturer, at 10 the next morning at Anneberg Park Lake.

"We'll be dumping about 2,000 to 3,000 fish into the lake," Phelps said. "And we're mainly putting in fish that bite a lot. The kids should all be able to catch a fish — knock on wood."

However, one limitation of the program is that it only allows 200 children to participate.

"We limit it to 200 kids for a good reason," Phelps said. "We want to produce a very quality clinic."

For this reason, registration will take place Sunday at the State Park Office in the Tuttle Creek River Pond area at 1 p.m. Registration will continue until 200 children have been registered. Phelps said the program fills up fast.

"We open at 1 o'clock and are usually full between 1:15 and 1:30," he said. "There's no cost, so we attract kids from all over the area, including Junction City, Salina and Clay Center."

Although 200 may seem like a small number, Phelps said he needs plenty of help.

"We can use a lot of volunteers," he said. "We'll take everyone who wants to volunteer. If they want to see kids having a good time we urge them to come out."

Among those already volunteering are officials from the Kansas Legislature and several K-State students.

Michael Dolan, junior in public relations, volunteered last year because his children were attending the clinic. Both he and his children will return this year to volunteer.

"Last year I thought, 'Hey, my kids would really enjoy this,'" he said. "It's great seeing all of those kids out there. It's just a good time."

"Volunteers feel they have something to offer to the community," Phelps said. "K-State students come from different parts of the country, and all want to share something with Manhattan."

Seniors learn alumni ropes during kickoff

CECILY RODRIQUEZ
staff reporter

K-State seniors were given the chance to make donations to the KSU Foundation last night at the GIFT kickoff at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

Last night from 6 to 9 Sam's Town Casino sponsored an event to boost donations. Graduates Investing For Tomorrow is a student-development program with a double mission: to inform seniors about the significance of alumni support and to help make the transition from coupon-clipping students to generous alumni a little easier.

Kelly Flynn, vice president of public relations for the Student Foundation, said, "Eventually, we want seniors to become participating alumni."

The Student Foundation was hoping for an attendance of at least 100 students. With more than 125 seniors attending, the kickoff was considered a success.

Sally Larson, committee chairperson for the GIFT program, said, "We were more than satisfied with the turnout we had tonight."

Amy Voorhes, senior in pre-nursing, said, "I'm glad they had the kickoff party. The fliers and advertisements aren't enough to get my participation. Now that I know what the program's about, I'll be much more willing to donate when I graduate."

Each senior received a free deck of cards and was entered into a grand-prize drawing for a free dinner and admission for two at Sam's Town Casino.

Matt Jacobs, senior in chemical engineering, won the grand prize.

Once students had their fill of free snacks, Student Body Vice President Aaron Otto made a personal pledge of $20 to the Foundation to set an example for other students that it's never to soon for donations.

Western Auto will sponsor the next GIFT event, Ticket for Success, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Sept. 17 at the Career Fair in the free-speech zone. The grand prize will be two tickets to the Chiefs vs. Colts football game.

The Foundation and KMKF-FM 101.5 will be at the K-State vs. Nebraska football game on Oct. 5 to give away a trip for two on the Catbacker bus to the Colorado game.

Greeks sponsor charity games

KELLY FURNAS

Alpha Gamma Rho and Pi Kappa Alpha will sponsor Beach Bash Saturday at Tuttle Creek State Park. The event will involve 10 sororities and six other fraternities, and proceeds will benefit Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan, Inc.

Activities start at 9 a.m. and include volleyball, horseshoes, tug of war, an obstacle course, inner-tube races, canoe races and a party at Lucky BrewGrille following the Indiana State game.

Seth Hayden, junior in business, who is the philanthropy chair for the Pike house, said the fraternaties expect to make about $3,500 from the event this year. Last year, Beach Bash made between $3,500 and $4,000, Hayden said.

"There's an entry fee of $75 for each team," he said. "Plus, sponsors pay $50, and we get all the money from T-shirt sales."

Hayden also said there is little cost for running the event.

"We get into the beach for free, and we have a radio station that is donating time," he said. "Plus, Lucky's and Bombers are letting us use their facilities."

Bombers will be the location of the Beauty and the Beach contest, which begins at 7:30 tonight and features members of the sororities involved in Beach Bash.

Commission approves restaurant chain's sign

MICHAEL O'LEARY
staff reporter

Next time you drive into the Wal-Mart parking lot, look to the southwest corner for a new sign for Spaghetti Jack's.

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board recommended approval of a 126-square foot sign for Spaghetti Jack's. The sign will be placed in the same place as the former Bonanza sign.

One member of the board dissented with the recommendation.

"I can see one, two, three, four pole signs looking me in the face. I don't think they need a pole sign. That is the busiest parking lot in the whole city," board member Jerry Reynard said.

Despite Reynard's objection, the board forwarded the proposal, which recommended approval to the city commission.

Spaghetti Jack's is a Wichita-based firm currently expanding its operations into Manhattan, Salina and Topeka. The goal is for a Nov. 30 opening.

John Saindon, Spaghetti Jack's representative, presented the proposal to the board.

"They serve a fast-food Italian in a sit-down atmosphere, with a quality comparable to that of the Olive Garden," Saindon said.

The board also discussed recommendations for the use of the two bridge piers that will be left from the old Kansas Highway 177 bridge.

K-State student provides horses with massage

HEATHER HJETLAND
staff reporter

One K-State student said massage isn't just for people anymore.

Jacqueline Bone, senior in animal science and industry, is a certified equine sports massage therapist. She specializes in massaging horses, but will treat any animal, including a human, that has a sports injury or needs to relax.

"I think these folks can make a horse feel better and assist muscle soreness. But they are no cure for disease," said Dr. Earl Gaughan, equine section head in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Bone said she doesn't cure anything with her massage techniques. She said she can only alleviate problems.

"I'm not a substitute for a veterinarian," Bone said.

For $50 she will travel to clients for a one-hour massage. Bone said this is primarily designed for the equine athlete who competes in racing, rodeo or equestrian riding. Show dogs can also be massaged to help them move more fluidly and give a better reach, Bone said.

Bone can do a free evaluation to decide if massage will work, and she also provides complimentary sessions for new clients. Although she has no clients yet, she is practicing on her own horses and putting together informational packets.

"I have no idea why it is not used more widely," she said. "From what I have learned, it is wonderful."

Bone said she loves horses and wants to help them out, but she had a difficult time finding her niche.

Bone had heard about equine massage, but few people are certified, and she couldn't find a school. She had thought about learning acupuncture, which is an alternative method used to treat animals.

However, she said she preferred massage because it is not invasive. She said she thinks it is better to use your hands as opposed to puncturing the skin with needles. In addition, only veterinarians can perform acupuncture.

Bone began taking human massage classes and applying it to her horses. Later she found an advertisement in Western Horseman Magazine for Equissage. This summer she traveled to Round Hill, Va., to become a certified equine sports massage therapist.

Under the guidance of Mary Schreiber, owner of Equissage, she took a five-day course, which cost $795. Classes were 11 hours each day, and Bone said it was an intensive, hands-on school.

Bone said there are many benefits of massage. It can increase the range of motion for a better chance of winning a competition. Massage relaxes muscle spasms in horses.

Bone said this is common because horses are 60 percent skeletal muscles, and they can feel the same as humans do after a workout.

Bone accepts clients by appointment. A typical session massages the whole body of the animal.

I particularly always have focused on education and children's issues, so I would hope to be involved in some way with those.

Fortmeyer: Would you play any role in a Bob Dole White House?

Kassebaum: No. I don't want to come back to Washington. I'm very supportive of Senator Dole — I'll do whatever I can to help on the campaign — but no.

Fortmeyer: I don't know if this is just one of those Kansas rumors, but would you ever consider taking over as president of one of the universities in Kansas?

Kassebaum: That story floated around when there was a vacancy at the University of Kansas. At that time, I thought university politics may be even worse than politics in Washington. (laughs)

I've been asked to lecture at several universities. I don't want to do that on a permanent basis. That's something that I will think through in the future. Right now, I guess I'm just anxious to get away from a schedule.

Fortmeyer: Speaking of lecturing, are you excited about giving the 30th-anniversary Landon Lecture?

Kassebaum: I am. I've done it once before (1989). I was very reluctant then to do it and even more reluctant the second time. Both President (Jon) Wefald and Dr. (Charles) Reagan prevailed on me to consider giving a sort of farewell speech looking at my 18 years in the Senate.

It's been a great lecture series, I think. It's had an astonishing array of people through those 30-some years. Dad loved it, and I really tend to think that is what gave him a renewed interest in public life and public affairs. He loved going over, when he was able, to each of the lectures.

It has been able to maintain the quality. And, of course, having all my children graduate from K-State, I have sort of lost my heart and pocketbook to K-State. (laughs)

Fortmeyer: I think one of the reasons you've been a successful senator for Kansas, and popular with Kansans, is your relatively moderate stance on issues. That doesn't seem to necessarily fit into the political climate in Washington anymore.

Kassebaum: Or even in Kansas. I think most people really like to believe there's some give-and-take in coming together to find a solution.

One of the things on health-insurance reform I've found that people say to me over and over again is they are so glad to see you working together — meaning Republicans and Democrats, Senator (Ted) Kennedy and myself. A lot of people roll their eyes about working with Senator Kennedy.

But you're working together to find a solution. Obviously, we differ, and we should differ, and we debate those differences. At the end of the day, I think most people think we should come together and find a solution on issues that are useful.

There's a certain civility of governance that I think is missing today. Perhaps it is a respect for different points of view. You don't have to agree, but you can respect someone else's opinion. Compromise has become kind of a wimpish word, but we all have to compromise.

Fortmeyer: Are you planning on writing...

Kassebaum: No.

Fortmeyer: No? None?

Kassebaum: If I write anything, it will be a mystery story. (laughs)

BOMBING

City, and were aimed at forcing the United States to pull out of the Middle East and stop supporting Israel.

The defendants were convicted of all seven charges related to the conspiracy. Yousef also was found guilty of killing a man with a bomb placed aboard a Philippines Airlines jet in 1994. That bombing was a test run for the plot, prosecutors said. Shah also was convicted of escaping from prison.

Prosecutors said the plot was hatched in the Philippines, where Yousef had turned his Manila apartment into a bomb factory.

Yousef, 28, was captured last year in Pakistan with the help of a $2-million reward. He had fled the United States hours after the World Trade Center was bombed.

During the four-month trial, Yousef acted as his own lawyer. With a good command of English, he argued that evidence was fabricated by the Philippine government to curry favor with the United States.

Yousef's self-defense put him face-to-face with witnesses such as a flight attendant who said she saw him sitting in the Philippines Airlines seat where a bomb went off on a later flight.

Prosecutors said the final attack plan was being drawn up in a Manila apartment on Jan. 6, 1995, when it nearly blew up in Yousef's face. He goofed while mixing chemicals and started a fire.

Yousef fled the smoky apartment, leaving a laptop computer containing flight times and itineraries for three U.S. airlines. Also left was a letter signed by the same group that sent a threatening letter after the Trade Center bombing, in which six people were killed and more than 1,000 injured.

Murad was arrested by Philippine police after claiming he started the fire while celebrating the new year with firecrackers. Shah was arrested in the Philippines, escaped, then was captured in Malaysia and brought to the United States.

Yousef and Murad both said they were detained by police and tortured during the time prosecutors alleged they were hatching the plot.

Yousef was accused of ordering nitric acid, sulfuric acid, thermometers, filters and other tools of the bomb trade, and plotting along with his cohorts to convert cheap plastic watches into timing devices that would be attached to bombs placed on the planes.

The convictions came as investigators look for proof that TWA Flight 800 was destroyed by terrorists with a bomb or a missile. Shah's lawyer, David Greenfield, said the jurors were probably influenced by the TWA investigation.

"It had to play a part," he said. Greenfield added he may argue on appeal that the United States had no jurisdiction in the case. "No overt act occurred within 10,000 miles of the United States," he said.

FBI Assistant Director James Kallstrom, who investigated the case and is currently leading the probe into the explosion of TWA Flight 800, would not comment on the possibility of a connection.

The convictions were the third successful prosecution of terrorists by the U.S. Attorney's office in New York since the Trade Center attack. In 1994, four men were convicted in the bombing.

AIDS educators needed in schools

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — While praising the 39 states that now require school AIDS-prevention programs, a three-fold increase in the past decade, the government on Thursday said more needs to be done to train teachers.

States offer training on how to address everything from condom use and HIV testing to sexual behavior, but only 31 percent of those who teach AIDS prevention were trained, the Centers for Disease Control said.

"The training could have been several hundred miles away, they couldn't get a substitute to fill in, or they couldn't get time off — whatever the reason, it was not getting down to the teachers," said Nancy Brener of the CDC's National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion.

Another problem, she said, was that more than half of AIDS-prevention programs were taught as part of another class, such as biology, rather than as a health-education class.

Teachers who taught health education gave students a more comprehensive look at AIDS and ways to prevent it, the CDC said.

Most of the teachers in other classes covered only six of the 17 topics outlined by CDC, restricting instruction to basic facts about AIDS, the CDC said.

"It was pretty much just general information about the disease," Brener said. "But then, they have to fit it into their other class."

Health educators also were more likely to have undergraduate degrees in health education and knew the best ways to convey information about AIDS, Brener said.

travel of students within groups. He said one student from each group should be allowed to attend only one convention each semester.

In the past, Glendening said, group members have abused funding from SGA by sending the same person to numerous conventions.

"It may not happen that often, but when it does we have this safety net that allows other to travel," he said.

But the amendment failed on a 21-27 vote. College of Arts and Sciences Sen. Ryan Laudermilk said, "These guys are in college, most of them have faculty advisers. They're big kids and can decide what they want to do."

The Big 12 RUNDOWN

(News & notes from the Conference)

• THE LONGHORNS have several players who will be questionable for Saturday's game with injuries, including running back Shon Mitchell, who hurt his hip.

"If Shon feels OK and wants to play, we'll probably get him in there," Texas coach John Mackovic said.

Also questionable are linebackers Matt Jones (hand) and Johnathan Hickerson (shoulder) as well as running back Chris Butcher (ankle) and tight end Derek Lewis (knee/ankle/shoulder). Texas (1-0, 1-0), 7 tonight, vs. New Mexico State

• KU JAYHAWK RUNNING BACK Running back June Henley's 187 yards rushing against Ball State was the ninth 100-plus yard game of his career.

He has now moved past former Jayhawk running backs John Riggins and Gale Sayers into third place on KU's all-time rushing chart with 2,679 yards.

Henley's three touchdowns also gives him 28 career touchdowns, tying him with Tony Sands for the most career touchdowns in Kansas history.

Kansas (1-0, 0-0), 9 p.m., Sept. 14, at Texas Christian

• TAILBACK BROCK OLIVO, the meat in Missouri's offense, suffered a set of bruised ribs on the first series of the second half in the Tigers' 40-10 loss to Texas last weekend. Olivo did not return to play, but should be ready for the Tigers' next game against Memphis.

Sophomore Devin West replaced Olivo and caught three passes, doubling his career total number of receptions at Missouri.

Missouri (0-1, 0-1), 7:30 p.m., Sept. 14, vs. Memphis

• THE CORNHUSKERS will be without star linebacker Terrell Farley when they open at home against Michigan State today. Farley was charged last Friday with driving while intoxicated. He has been suspended indefinitely by Huskers coach Tom Osborne.

Osborne said the indefinite suspension could last the entire season. Farley was the 1995 Big 8 defensive newcomer of the year and a second-team all-American.

Nebraska (0-0, 0-0), noon today, vs. Michigan State

• X-RAYS ON DEFENSIVE TACKLE Cody Patton confirmed a fractured bone in his right leg. Patton is out indefinitely, Tech officials said. The injury was suffered during Tech's 21-14 loss at K-State last Saturday. Also injured was running back Byron Hanspard, who twisted his ankle in the third quarter and did not play in the rest of the game. Hanspard said the injury was minor and he would be available for today's contest against the Cowboys.

Texas Tech (0-1, 0-1), 12:30 today, vs. Oklahoma State (at Dallas)

• STEVE OWENS, a Heisman Trophy-winning tailback at Oklahoma in 1969 was named the school's athletic director. Owens succeeds Donnie Duncan who resigned in May.

The 48-year-old Owens' first act as athletic director was to recommend the appointment of interim athletic director Larry Naifeh as associate athletic director.

Oklahoma (0-0, 0-0), 3:30 today vs. Texas Christian

• NEXT ISSUE: SEPT. 14, 1996. Remember to pick up your copy of Gameday Manhattan with complete pregame features and coverage of the Cincinnati vs. K-State football matchup. Dan Lewerenz profiles sophomore Justin Swift, K-State's starting tight end from Overland Park.

MIKE LAWRENCE breaks through the Colorado State defense during the Holiday Bowl last season.

Five years ago it did not look so easy.

It was Sept. 7, 1991. K-State led Indiana State, 24-19, late in the fourth quarter. Indiana State had the ball and was driving, when Sycamores quarterback Ray Allen hit receiver Charles Swann for a 20-yard touchdown to pull the Sycamores ahead 25-24 with 3:24 left on the clock.

Indiana State decided to attempt a two-point conversion. It wanted to increase its lead to three and eliminate the possibility of losing on a Wildcat field goal. But Allen's pass attempt was intercepted by K-State's William Price and returned the other way for two points for the Cats. The play provided the final margin in the K-State 26-25 victory.

That season-opening victory helped propel the Cats to its first winning season in nine years.

Sycamores coach Dennis Raetz said his team will have to play near-flawless football for an Indiana State win in the rematch on Saturday.

"We have to play the very best we can in order to have a chance to win," Raetz said. "Obviously there are a lot of other teams I'd rather play than Kansas State."

Both will take the field on Saturday fresh from season-opening victories.

The Sycamores routed Mars Hill last week, 48-0. K-State is coming off a 21-14 victory against Texas Tech.

Raetz said the challenge for any NCAA I-AA team, and his team in particular, is it will not only have to play extremely well to win, but will have to play well even to keep the game close.

"Over the years, the biggest thing you have to do is play extremely well or you're going to be embarrassed," Raetz said.

Snyder said his team is also going to have to improve its season-opening play.

"We were fortunate to win the ball game," Snyder said. "I think they're all correctable mistakes, and that's what we're working on right now."

He said playing NCAA I-AA Indiana State changes game preparation little for the Cats.

"You're trying to correct mistakes. This would be no different for us no matter who we might be playing," Snyder said.

Quarterback Brian Kavanagh said mistakes were numerous last week against Texas Tech, but it was the Cats ability to come together as a team that helped the team prevail.

"Thank God it's a team. Whatever they were doing was very effective," Kavanagh said.

> "Obviously there are a lot of other teams I'd rather play than Kansas State."
>
> • DENNIS RAETZ
> INDIANA STATE COACH

In that game, K-State was out gained by 232 yards in total offense, and allowed 17 more first downs.

Snyder said Texas Tech's blitz, which caused problems for K-State throughout the game, exposed a weakness in the Cats, and he expects to see it again.

"We need to re-prepare for some of the things Texas Tech did. We'll see it again," Snyder said. "I think Indiana State will certainly look at that."

Snyder said, however, there is no way his team can afford to look past the Sycamores, especially after the struggles against Texas Tech.

"It's so easy to take things for granted," Snyder said. "That's something we want to be extremely cautious about."

MEDICAL REPORT

MARTIN GRAMATICA celebrates a successful field goal kick against KU during the game at KSU Stadium last season. Gramatica is injured and is out for this season.

SHANE MCCORMICK
staff writer

When K-State takes the field Saturday night, it will see a familiar face in Scott Collins. But Collins will be standing on the sidelines of Indiana State, not K-State.

Collins transferred from K-State to Indiana State this past summer and is immediately eligible to play.

"Scott was the No. 2 kicker here," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He didn't feel he had an opportunity to kick here.

"He wasn't upset with anyone here, he just wanted the opportunity to see some playing time."

Although Collins is listed as the backup kicker and punter on the Sycamores depth chart, he did see action in Indiana State's first game. Against Mars Hill, Collins got off three punts, averaging 39.7 yards a punt.

With the departure of Collins and a knee injury to Martin Gramatica, the kicking duties are left to true freshman Jamie Rheem.

Following his first career start last week against Texas Tech, Rheem said he was surprised to find out he would be playing this season.

"All through the summer, I thought I would be red-shirted," Rheem said. "When I saw Martin go down, I knew it was bad. Right then, my heart started pumping really fast, and I started to think about that first game."

Against the Red Raiders, Rheem made the most of his opportunity, connecting on all three of his extra-point attempts.

During his senior season at Wichita Collegiate, Rheem made 10 of 12 field goal attempts, and connected on 55 to 56 extra-point attempts.

His career-long field goal was 47 yards. Rheem said he has hit from 60 and 65 yards in practice.

After his senior season, Rheem said he turned down scholarship offers from both Kansas and Missouri.

"I just really liked K-State better," Rheem said. "I really liked the coaches here, they seemed more involved in recruiting me."

Although Rheem is a true freshman, Snyder said he is confident in Rheem's ability.

"Jamie Rheem will do fine out there," Snyder said. "He is going to be a good kicker for our program."

Snyder also said that Chad Romano will be the No. 2 kicker behind Rheem.

Although he has yet to attempt a field goal in a collegiate game, Rheem said he is not nervous about the opportunity.

"When you get the opportunity, you have to put everything behind you and take it," Rheem said. "I'm just looking forward to my chance to get out there and show people what I can do."

JAMIE RHEEM, placekicker, kicks a field goal during practice Tuesday afternoon. Because starting placekicker Martin Gramatica is injured, Rheem is the new starting placekicker for the Wildcats

RYAN YOUNG, K-State offensive lineman, pushes his way through Texas Tech defenders during the K-State/Texas Tech game.

Out in the limelight

Young follows team-player precepts

DAN LEWERENZ
staff writer

When he's not playing football, sophomore offensive tackle Ryan Young usually rents a video and spends the evening at home.

His favorite movie is "Carlito's Way," starring Al Pacino.

"Pacino's always really smooth, so controlled," Young said. "I'd like to think someday I could be that smooth."

In "Carlito's Way," Pacino plays a reformed Puerto Rican gangster whose devotion to his friends, still knee-deep in the underworld, leads to his eventual demise.

It might be Pacino's smooth appearance that appeals to Young. But it's the devotion to others, the sense of being a part of something greater, that Young sees in himself.

"We're a team, and the offensive linemen might feel that even more than everyone else," he said.

> "We might not get the hype the rest of the players get, but on the field we know."
> • RYAN YOUNG
> OFFENSIVE LINEMAN

Why? His partners on offense rack up touchdowns and fill the highlight reels. His teammates on defense record tackles and register the bone-crushing hits fans want to see again and again.

Offensive linemen rarely get mentioned unless they miss their blocking assignment — "Brian Kavanagh got sacked again," they'll say. "Who missed the block?"

But toiling in anonymity has not dampened the spirit of this 6'6", 320-pound giant.

"It never bothers me," Young said. "It's all fine for them to get the attention. We might not get the hype the rest of the players get, but on the field, we know and they know it has to be a team effort.

"The receivers can't make the great catches if we don't protect the quarterback. It's all part of a team."

And perhaps it's not Pacino whom Young sees in himself, but rather the movie. At the end of the film, Pacino's past catches up to him in the form of two bullets to the chest.

Young might never be the hero, but it's his job to make sure the movie has a different ending. The hero can't die — not on his watch.

Cross country team builds foundations

SHANA NEWELL
staff writer

A house's foundation must be strong before the framework can be installed. The rest of the construction falls into place.

The same can be said about the K-State cross country program.

Coach Terry Drake said he has different concerns for the upcoming season when comparing the men's side to the women's. But each concern is based on the idea of building.

"On the women's side, I'm worried how our freshmen react to college. It's a time-building sport, and we're building the groundwork for the future," Drake said.

Building that groundwork requires recruiting strong material. Drake might have found the right recruits in freshmen Kathryn Wolfram and Kelly Andra.

Wolfram and Andra join a squad that lacks tested veterans. Senior Samantha McNamara was the Cats' No. 1 runner in the 3,000- and 5,000-meters in track last year, finishing seventh in the Big 8.

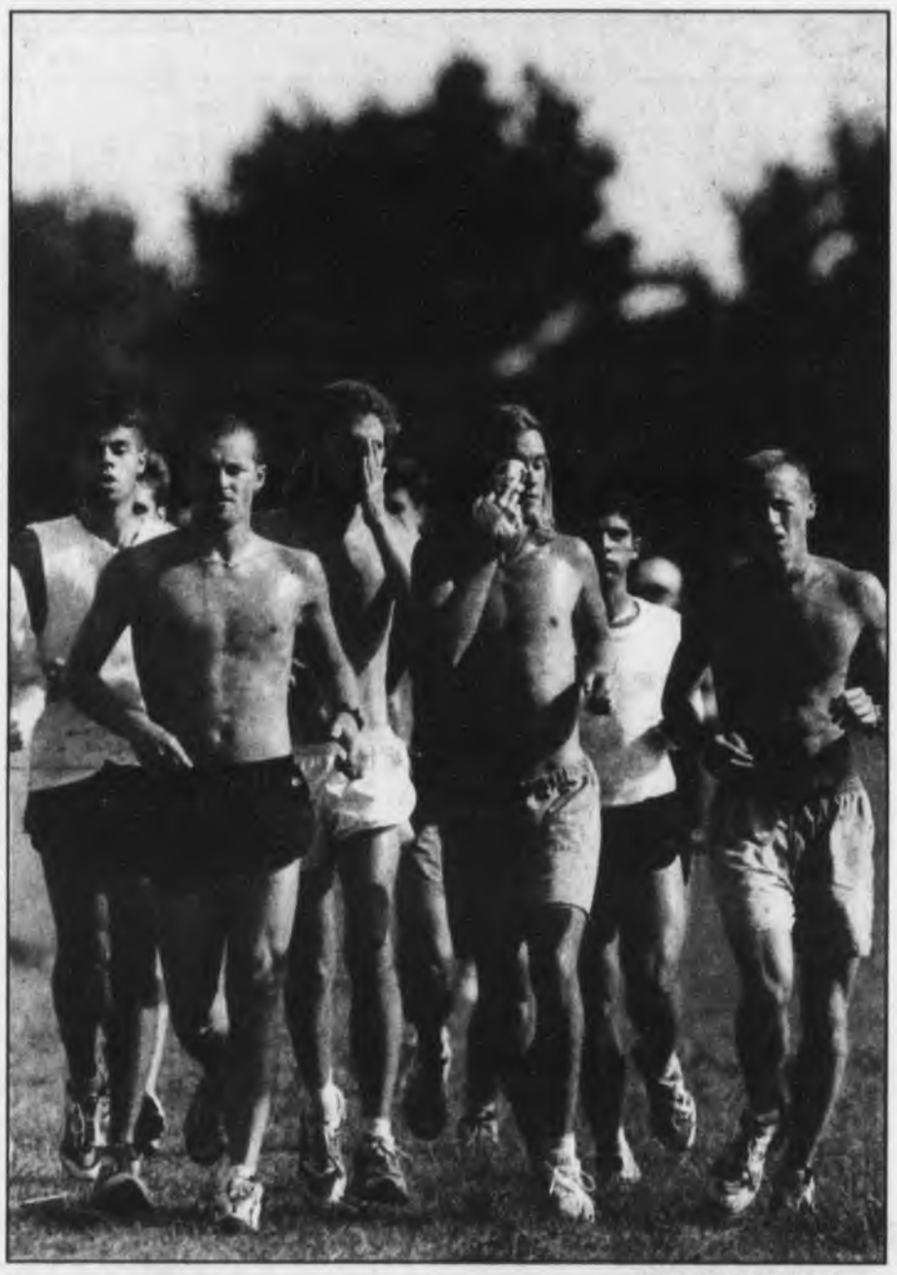
Drake said he expects McNamara to be the No. 1 runner this year, but that depends on how strong a runner Wolfram will be.

Also expected to compete in one of the Cats' top positions is Charity Swartz. She was the No. 4 runner last season, but Drake said he expects more from her this fall.

"She trained really hard over the summer, and she had a great track season. She could do a lot better this year," Drake said.

On the men's side, Drake has a different agenda.

That groundwork consists of five returning runners who have the ability to carry the squad to victories. Drake said his only concerns on the men's side are its health and its depth.



"If one of our top five guys gets hurt, we'll be OK, because we have a strong sixth man. But if two of those guys get hurt, we'll be in trouble," he said.

Perhaps the biggest strength the men's squad has going for it is its ignorance, Drake said.

"This team is better than they think. This may be the year," he said. "They can go to a meet and be racing against someone and not know how good that other person is. That could be a good thing, because they don't know that the other team is supposed to be better. Sometimes ignorance is bliss."

With the departing of John Thorpe for personal reasons, Ryan Clive-Smith is the lone proven runner on the team, but Zach Davies and Chris May are expected to run well this season.

The cross country team opens competition today at the Wildcat Invitational sponsored by Baker University in Baldwin. Its only home competition of the season will be the KSU Invitational Sept. 28.

WILDCAT FLASHBACK

Combined efforts give Wildcat fans exciting inaugural Big 12 match-up

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Visitors to KSU Stadium last Saturday got more than they bargained for.

Leading Texas Tech 14-3, heading into the fourth quarter of the game, K-State had to stave off an 11-point run in the last six minutes of the contest to defeat the Red Raiders 21-14.

And if it weren't for a combined effort from defensive backs Mario Smith and Lamar Chapman, Tech just might have tied the game with 38 seconds remaining.

K-State's defense, which had been on the field for all but 3:13 of the fourth quarter, was tired. An overtime game might have resulted in a Red Raider victory.

K-State was hanging on.

"Any time you come off the field after giving up a touchdown and the offense gives the ball right back, yeah, you're hanging on," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "You bet your boots we were."

The Wildcats widened their lead to 21-3 early in the fourth quarter when Smith recovered a wild punt snap in the Raiders' end zone. It was one of many Tech errors in the kicking game. The Raiders also missed four field goals and fumbled away a punt.

"I don't think I'll be asked to go to any coaching clinics in the off-season to speak about the kicking game," Texas Tech coach Spike Dykes said.

Tech narrowed the K-State lead on an 80-yard, 20-play drive in which it converted on three fourth downs.The touchdown play came on a 14-yard pass from quarterback Zebbie Lethridge to fullback Sammy Morris. The Wildcats were too busy trying to call timeout because they had only 10 men on the field.

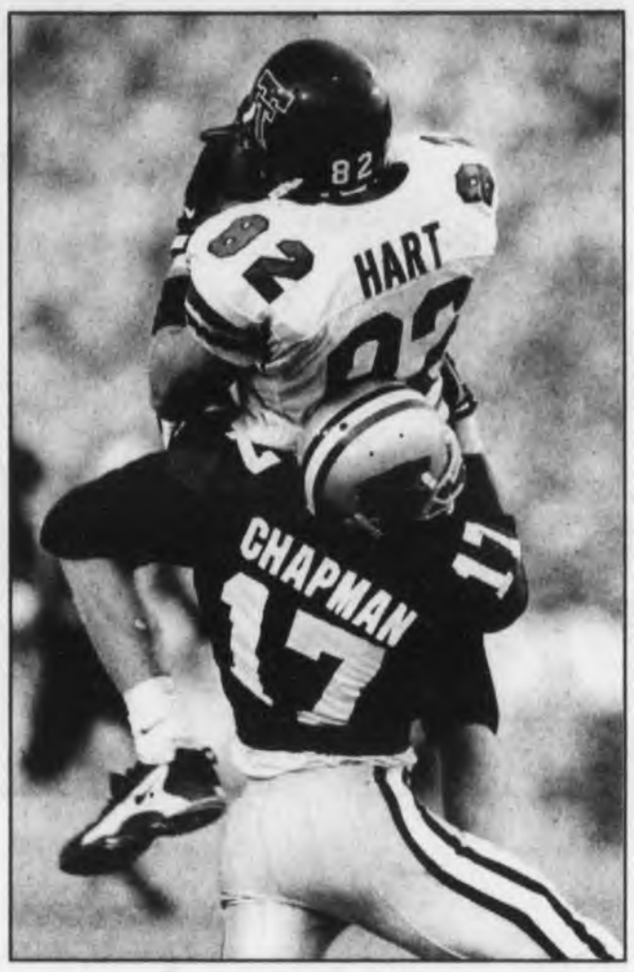
"As offenses tend to do," K-State defensive coordinator Bob Cope said, "they threw to the guy who wasn't covered."

The offense failed to produce, turning the ball back over to the Raiders without getting a first down. The Cats defense held on enough to hold Tech to a 53-yard field goal by backup kicker Jaret Greaser with 2:27 remaining. The score was 21-14.

Texas Tech attempted an onsides-kick, but it was kicked right into the arms of Wildcat tight end Justin Swift at the Tech 44. The victory appeared signed, sealed and delivered for K-State, at least for a moment. But quarterback Brian Kavanagh and tailback Mike Lawrence botched a handoff and Tech recovered the ball midfield with 2:18 remaining.

The Raiders drove deep into K-State territory on runs by backup tailback Adrian Ervin, filling in for the injured Byron Hanspard. With just more than a minute remaining, overtime appeared probable.

At the 13-yard line, Texas Tech had first and 10. But K-State's defense found energy deep within themselves and tightened up, forcing a fourth and 18 at the 21-yard line. Lethridge found leaping Donnie Hart just in front of the goal line with a perfect pass. But Hart wouldn't land on his own. Stopped by Chapman and nailed with a jarring smash by Smith, the ball was knocked loose.



K-State recovered on downs, Kavanagh took a knee for the final seconds of the inaugural Big 12 game and K-State marked the first-ever victory between Big 12 members in its books, 21-14.

But as Kavanagh and Kevin Lockett said, the game belonged to the defense.

"Thank God it's a team," Kavanagh said. "You won't see a game like that from the offense ever again."

"This win definitely belongs to the defense," Lockett said.

With only 160 yards total offense by the Cats, minus 12 on the ground, most people would say the same.

LAMAR CHAPMAN holds up Texas Tech's Donnie Hart for a big hit by Mario Smith in the Red Raiders' unsuccessful drive Saturday at KSU Stadium. Smith's hit on Hart knocked the ball loose and brought the game to a halt while Tech trainers made sure Hart's neck was not injured.

Asbury rumored top choice

Inside

The editorial board encourages students to take another look at K-State's basketball program and let Asbury know whether he's appreciated.

■ Men's basketball coach might be candidate for California position.

Wildcat coach Tom Asbury's name is being circulated as one of the top candidates to replace former California coach Todd Bozeman.

Remember when the K-State basketball team traveled to the Otis Spunkmeyer Classic last December and defeated host California 65-58 in a come-from-behind upset in the championship game? Even if you've forgotten, it appears Cal hasn't.

"I've had no discussions with California about the job opening at Berkeley," Asbury said Thursday night in a statement released Friday by the K-State sports information office. "All I'm doing is preparing my team for the upcoming season."

But the San Francisco Chronicle-Examiner reported Sunday morning that Asbury met with Cal officials last week in Chicago, and he is a top candidate.

The Chronicle-Examiner also reported Cal met with Duke assistant coach Tommy Amaker and Eastern Michigan coach Ben Braun, also top candidates.

Bozeman resigned Aug. 28 amid allegations of recruiting violations. Sexual-misconduct questions also arose shortly after Bozeman's resignation. Cal is undergoing an NCAA investigation into the recruiting violations. The investigation appears likely to result in sanctions.

Cal athletic director John Kasser has set Sept. 14 as the deadline for hiring a replacement for Bozeman. If he is unable to do so, Kasser has said he plans to let Bears assistant coach Billy Kennedy take over for the upcoming basketball season.

Kasser has proposed plans to keep Bozeman's staff intact for the new coach. This complicates the search for a replacement. Nearly every head coach will bring at least one of his own assistants to the new program.

Asbury is 29-27 after two years as head of the Wildcat program. Last season, the Wildcats went 17-12, earning a berth in the NCAA Tournament. It was the Cats' first NCAA Tournament appearance in three years.

California is not a foreign place to Asbury. Before arriving in Manhattan, Asbury coached at Pepperdine University in Malibu, Calif., for six years. While there, his teams compiled a 125-59 record with five postseason appearances.

COACH TOM ASBURY tightens the knot on his tie during last season's game against the University of Oklahoma in Bramlage Coliseum. Asbury came to K-State from Pepperdine University in 1994.

Activities Carnival informs more than 2,000 students

STORY BY BREE BISNETTE

Between 2,000 and 2,500 students with hands, arms, bags and heads full of information made their way through the 111 booths at the 40th annual Union Program Council Activities Carnival on Sunday.

From 4 to 7 p.m., K-State members of clubs and organizations supervised information displays on the first two floors of the K-State Student Union. Members of organizations provided information and, in some cases, souvenirs and entertainment relating to their groups for students who were interested.

There was a variety of displays at the carnival. Live demonstrations were given by the K-State Aikido Club. Students could play a dice game in which the grand prize was a Nintendo game system at the Society for Creative Writers and Movie Makers booth.

Or, for $5, students could purchase white T-shirts and tie-dye them at the UPC Arts Committee station.

Booths provided a range of materials for students to pick up at their tables. They included everything from literature about clubs to snacks to free Bibles in more than eight languages, which could be found at the Chi Alpha Christian Fellowship station.

"I found things I might be interested in that I didn't even know existed," said Candice Jellison, a freshman in criminology who had signed up to be a member of Habitat for Humanity. "This carnival has allowed me to get information on what kind of organizations there are and how they help their members and the community."

Many students found clubs dealing with their

Speaker serves 18-year tenure as voters' choice

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Although she represents the entire state, many Kansans feel a personal connection with Senator Nancy Landon Kassebaum, who delivers a Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

During her 18-year tenure in the United States Senate, Kassebaum has worked on issues, such as funding small-town airports and legislation to create a national park in Kansas, that have touched many of her constituents.

Even though she attended the University of Kansas, she is connected with K-State through her four children, who were all Wildcats. Over the years, she's been an active supporter of K-State, whether persuading high-profile personalities to give a Landon Lecture or speaking at the opening of the Throckmorton Hall expansion in 1994.

Susan Peterson, assistant to the president for governmental relations, has known Kassebaum since her first campaign for the U.S. Senate in 1978. Peterson was working for the Kansas Republican Party.

Peterson said she watched Kassebaum's campaign in the 1978 primaries and, once she clasped the nomination, helped with her campaign for Senate.

"She had this green dress with elephants on it and she wore it every day," Peterson said. "By the end of the summer it was faded to light green, but that was her trademark.

"I thought it was brilliant," she said. "In a nine-person primary you had to stick out somehow."

Peterson said Kassebaum's 1978 campaign was very grassroots.

"The intensity level that people supported her was unprecedented in Kansas political history," she said. "And she's retained huge approval ratings among the people."

Senator Nancy Landon Kassebaum will deliver a Landon Lecture today at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium.

Peterson said one of the many unconventional ways of campaigning Kassebaum employed was soup suppers.

"She went to every county in Kansas and had soup suppers," she said. "It was her way of meeting and visiting with people — very low-key, very grassroots, and very people-oriented."

"I will respect her opinion, and she will be missed," Peterson said.

Wheat quality tops past 5 years' crops

HEATHER HJETLAND
staff reporter

The wheat fields of Kansas have been harvested. Despite a record winter drought that reduced the number of bushels produced, crop quality is high.

David Frey, Kansas Wheat Commission administrator, said crop quality is better than it has been in the past five years.

Although the wheat harvested looks good, Frey said the size of the crops is significantly down. The drought in Kansas reduced the average yield of wheat per acre.

"There is good quality but not good quantity, so incomes for farmers will be down," Frey said.

The drought caused the price of wheat to rise significantly this winter and spring. Barry Tierney, professor of agricultural economics, said wheat prices in late April were $7 per bushel, an all-time nominal high. The current price of wheat is about $4.50 per bushel.

Tierney said consumers shouldn't be largely affected by the high price of grain.

"The cost of wheat in the retail price of food is relatively small," Tierney said.

In addition, the price of wheat has not increased at the same rate income has, Frey said.

"The U.S. has the lowest percentage of disposable income spent on food than that of any other country in the world," Frey said.

The drought also resulted in a considerable proportion of abandoned acres, said Charles Ruckman, agricultural statistician with the Kansas Agricultural Statistics Service in Topeka.

Ruckman said 25 percent of the 11,800,000 acres of wheat seeded were abandoned. That's an increase of 19 percent from the 1995 crop.

The drought hurt many acres, but good weather since May resulted in high protein and test weights, Saline County wheat farmer

State of University Address highlights accomplishments

KELLY FURNAS
staff writer

K-State President Jon Wefald named the upcoming dedication of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and K-State's becoming the university of choice for Kansas high school graduates as some of the University's big accomplishments over the past decade in his State of the University Address Friday.

"Ten years ago when I came to Kansas State University, I had as one of my goals that we would take K-State up several notches in the Big 8," Wefald said. "I believe that any objective observer would agree that we have certainly done this."

Wefald mentioned several achievements of the University during his tenure:

Wefald

- A reversal in the enrollment decline which has now risen to an all-time high. "We have become the university of choice for graduating Kansas high school students," Wefald said.
- A fundraising effort, which, starting five years ago, has raised over $180 million for K-State.
- The upcoming dedication of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. K-State was the only university from the Big 8 without an art museum.
- The upcoming competition of a $30-million addition to the library. "This is not just an addition," Wefald said. "This is truly a new library inside and out."
- The numerous awards won by faculty and students, including six CASE Professor of the Year Awards for Kansas. "When it's all said and done, it is the distinguished faculty and the outstanding students that make a first-rate university," Wefald said.

In addition, he spoke about the numerous financial benefits the faculty has received over the past year, including a 2.5-percent increase in faculty salaries at mid-year, and an average increase of about 2.5 percent in salary for classified staff.

"Faculty salaries have always been on the top of my list of priorities for the University," he said, "and I will never rest until the faculty are paid on a level equivalent to their peers."

Wefald also said that Kansas universities have fared well in the State Legislature. The Crumbling Classrooms bond issue passed, which will give K-State $32.3 million dollars to repair infrastructure. The other bill allows for tuition accountability at K-State and the University of Kansas. This allows for K-State to keep any additional tuition funds over base enrollment as well as a quarter of any tuition increase in the future.

Despite all of the accomplishments, Wefald said K-State could see hard times ahead.

"Today we face in this nation a climate that is not favorable to higher education," he said. "There is a growing no-tax, anti-government, anti-economic development, anti-social service mentality in our state and nation. Universities are no longer respected and loved as they once were."

Wefald said he saw challenges such as decreases in state and federal funding for universities, combined with increasing enrollment and demand for higher-quality

NATION WORLD

• HURRICANE FRAN AFTERMATH. Their neighborhoods in tatters but their resolve largely intact, residents of hurricane-battered areas turned Sunday to cleaning up formidable messes, watching swollen waterways and adjusting to life without electricity. At least six people were still reported missing. Four electric utilities reported a total of 596,000 customers still without power. Water, and especially ice, remained crucial commodities and lines formed at stores offering supplies — many for free.

• SOLDIERS IN JAPAN. Okinawans voted more than 10-to-1 Sunday in favor of a reduction of U.S. military bases on their islands, in a referendum aimed at pressuring Washington to pull out its troops. With virtually all of the ballots counted late Sunday night, more than 90 percent of voters said there were too many U.S. troops on their southern islands, and that the agreement giving the troops special legal status should be changed.

• TUPAC SHOT. Rapper Tupac Shakur and Death Row Records chairman Marion "Suge" Knight were shot in a car as they rode down Las Vegas' busy casino strip, and Shakur was in critical condition Sunday.

• IRAQI UNREST. A Kurdish faction allied with President Saddam Hussein captured two towns from a rival Kurdish group in fierce fighting Sunday. The groups gave conflicting accounts of whether Saddam's forces took part in the assaults. Iraq, meanwhile, claimed it fired anti-aircraft weapons at U.S. and allied aircraft patrolling no-fly zones over its territory Sunday. The Iraqi fire missed, and the planes fled. Iraq made the same claim on Friday and Saturday, also saying there were no hits. American pilots have said they have detected no Iraqi response to their sorties.

• EU SUMMIT. European Union leaders will hold a one-day summit Oct. 5 to speed up reforms aimed at adding new members to the world's largest trading bloc. Foreign ministers meeting here said Saturday the gathering was requested by French president Jacques Chirac. The European Union has agreed to take in East European members. But first it wants to overhaul its bureaucracy, streamlining decision-making and reorganizing key agencies.

SPORTS

• PROMINENT SPORTS DOCTOR DIES. Dr. Robert K. Kerlan, a prominent orthopedic surgeon who treated athletes including basketball greats Wilt Chamberlain and Earvin "Magic" Johnson and jockey Bill Shoemaker, died early Sunday. He was 74. Kerlan, former team physician to the Los Angeles Rams, Lakers and Dodgers, died of pneumonia at St. John's Hospital. He had been unable to practice medicine since March 1994, when he underwent heart bypass surgery after a hip replacement.

• FORMER SHORTSTOP DIES. Willy Miranda, the flamboyant shortstop who played for the Baltimore Orioles and New York Yankees in the 1950s, has died of lung cancer. Miranda, 70, died at Good Samaritan Hospital in Baltimore on Saturday. Born in Cuba, Miranda defected to the United States with the help of an American flight crew that hid him in the cockpit of a Miami-bound airplane. He later returned to Cuba in a sailboat in 1980 to help others leave the Caribbean country during the Mariel boatlift.

• 40-HOMER RECORD BROKEN. Todd Hundley of the New York Mets on Sunday became the ninth player to hit 40 home runs this season, breaking the major-league record set when Roger Maris and seven others did it in 1961. Hundley joined Mark McGwire, Albert Belle, Brady Anderson, Ken Griffey Jr. and Juan Gonzalez of the AL, and Andres Galarraga, Gary Sheffield and Sammy Sosa of the NL to reach the mark. Jay Buhner (39), Mo Vaughn (38) and Vinny Castilla (36) were also closing in on the 40-mark going into Sunday.

Bike officer joins K-State Police

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

K-State Police has added a bicycle patrol officer this fall. Officer Greg Lenkiewicz has been hired to fill the position.

"Our police officers are no different than other police officers in the state of Kansas," Robert Mellgren, assistant director of the campus police, said.

"They go through the same training, have the same powers and use the same equipment. A bike officer is no different, except he doesn't have a car," he said.

Lenkiewicz carries the same belt other officers do, including a handgun and radio; however, some equipment, such as a radar gun, is not as readily available to bike officers.

"The bicycle officer will be working in conjunction with Parking Services for the purpose of bicycle enforcement," Ronnie Grice, director of K-State Police, said.

Grice said the position was needed because of problems with bicycles last year, especially in crowded areas.

One of Lenkiewicz's duties will be to patrol the entire campus, including the dismount zones, and enforce regulations.

However, the police are not going to just start writing tickets up for everyone riding in these areas.

"We have got to go through a phase of educating the people out there, and heavy-handed enforcement is not going to do that. There is not going to be a set policy on who gets a ticket and who doesn't. It's going to be officer discretion," Mellgren said.

"Most of it will depend on how blatant the violation is and how much disregard the offender has for pedestrians on the sidewalk," Lenkiewicz said.

Students have different views on whether these areas should be enforced and whether citations should be issued.

Kevin Murdock, senior in park resource management, said he had no problem with ticketing people for riding on sidewalks, as long as the people who walk on the bike paths are ticketed as well.

Mellgren said pedestrians probably would not be ticketed, because signs around campus indicate pedestrians have the right of way.

"I could write tickets all day long, but they probably wouldn't be prosecuted," Mellgren said.

Adaryl Wakefield, freshman in engineering, didn't agree that ticketing for riding on sidewalks is a good idea.

"I feel that is really extraneous because people on bikes need the sidewalks and grass to get around people, and roads just don't lead to everywhere on this campus.

"We ride bikes because that is really the most efficient way to get around campus. If you take away the grass and sidewalks, there is really nothing left."

Grice said he sees this additional position as a benefit in several areas.

From a public-relations standpoint, this will make the police more visible, and it will also provide more enforcement and education to the K-State community.

GREG LENKIEWICZ has been added to the K-State Police as a bicycle officer.

Bicycle regulations have not been determined

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

Students still aren't required to register their bikes with Parking Services, although it is stated in the KSU Bike Regulation Handbook that bikes need to be registered, Interim Parking Director Peggy Winkler said.

"They are still not required to register, so you will not be ticketed for not having a sticker," she said.

However, registering bikes is helpful for identification if they are stolen.

Other bike regulations will still be enforced. Bicycles locked to railings, posts or trees will be subject to penalty.

"Parking will still be issuing citations for bikes that are chained to handicapped railings, signs next to the sidewalk and things other than bike racks, particularly the ones that disrupt the flow of pedestrian traffic," Winkler said.

Parking control officers might do a field impound of bikes in violation, especially if they are causing a problem where they are locked. This would involve a lock being placed on the bike that could not be removed by the owner. The lock is similar to a wheel lock on a car.

Campus police could also be called out to cut the lock and impound the bicycle, Winkler said.

The police now have a bike officer whose primary responsibility will be patrolling. The officer will also have the authority to ticket for moving violations.

Michael Lamm, sophomore in history and political science, said he doesn't think bikes should be ticketed for where they are parked, except in extreme cases.

"I don't see why they should be ticketed. It's not the same as parking a car there. As long as it's not blocking anybody's way to get anywhere, I don't think it should be ticketed," Lamm said.

Kristen Latto, junior in advertising, said she agreed with Lamm. She said sometimes the bike racks are all full, making it hard to find a place to park.

Winkler said more bike racks have been ordered to help ease the overcrowding of the present racks and keep people from locking bikes to other objects.

"I just sent a request to facilities to construct $5,000 worth of bike racks," Winkler said.

Winkler also said racks have recently been added on the north side of Seaton Hall. She will evaluate areas on campus to see where the new racks are needed.

Students help politicians on campaign trail

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

Someone grabbed Maggie Keating when she was leaving class last week. The student who grabbed her wanted to know where to get a Clinton-Gore button like the one on Keating's backpack.

Keating, sophomore in political science, is the K-State liaison for Democrat Jill Docking's U.S. Senate campaign. She said grunt work such as finding buttons is important.

"In order to change the world, you've got to stuff envelopes and things like that," she said.

Keating is one of several students doing this kind of work.

Bret Glendening, junior in agricultural economics and political science, volunteered for U.S. Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who is Docking's opponent, this summer.

ONE VOICE ★ ONE VOTE

Interested in the upcoming elections? The Collegian keeps track of its Election '96 articles on the Web at (http://collegian.ksu.edu).

He put up yard signs in his hometown of Plainville. He also walked in the Riley County Fair parade with several other Brownback volunteers.

Jason Cole, senior in political science and philosophy, said he also does the odd jobs campaigns require. Cole is taking this semester off to work as research director and treasurer in Democrat John Frieden's U.S. House of Representatives campaign against Republican Jim Ryun.

"As research director, I wear a lot of different hats," Cole said.

He keeps track of what Ryun says and whether it is fair and honest. He also keeps Frieden up to speed on campaign issues.

As treasurer, he keeps track of who gives money to the campaign and where the money goes.

Mike Zamrzla, graduate student in student counseling and personal services, volunteers for Republican Jeff Peterson's campaign against Democrat Sheila Hochhauser for the Kansas House of Representatives.

Zamrzla said he coordinates door-to-door campaigning, yard signs and volunteers.

Some students have learned to organize their time from this experience.

Cole usually works on Frieden's campaign from 6:30 a.m. until 11:30 p.m.

"It's not a 9-to-5 job," he said. "You typically take homework home with you at night."

OPINION

EDITOR: SERA TANK 532-0730 (KAROLYI@KSU.KSU.EDU) MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1996 PAGE 4

IN OUR OPINION

Lack of Cat support could drive Asbury to California

K-State's basketball program might be losing the best thing that has happened to it since — well, in a long, long time.

Wildcat coach Tom Asbury is being considered for the vacant coaching position at California, and the deadline for hiring the new coach has been set for Sept. 14. That's this coming Saturday. If Asbury is offered the position, he won't have long to think about it.

WHY WE CARE

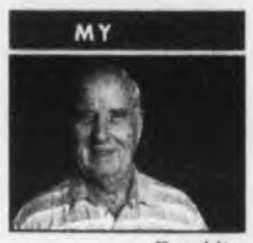
Basketball coach Tom Asbury has turned the program around. But if he doesn't get the support he needs, we fear he might leave to find it.

Let's make the decision easy for him. K-State cannot afford to lose a coach the caliber of Asbury. When he arrived in 1994, Asbury made a pledge to bring K-State basketball back into the national spotlight — a spotlight that right now, the Jayhawks hold.

Once upon a time, K-State's football program left something to be desired. But Coach Bill Snyder was given a pledge of support from alumni, students and the administration. Snyder has built a perennial Top 25 program and annual bowl contender. He has built K-State football into a powerhouse. But he didn't do it overnight.

Asbury needs that support, too. He's not getting it. Too many times, Bramlage Coliseum is half empty.

In two years as K-State's head coach, Asbury has turned the program around, compiling a 29-27 record and an NCAA Tournament appearance. He's changed the look of K-State basketball by recruiting from out-of-state and adding size and power. He just needs time.



Because it will not be basketball season for several weeks, we cannot suggest to you, the students, to bombard Bramlage with your support. But you can call the basketball office at 532-6531 or e-mail Asbury at (tasbury@ksu.edu).

Let him know you'll be there to support the Cats when the season starts and that you want him to continue building the program he has started. Otherwise, Cal just might make an offer Asbury can't refuse.

Candidates' leadership abilities more important that their service records

MY

Franklin DAVIS

Bob Dole's insistence on making President Clinton's non-service record in Vietnam an issue in this year's presidential election is, at best, an old and honored soldier's cherished reflections on his own service in World War II.

At worst, it is a cynical attempt to blur the distinctions between these two wars.

World War II threatened our shores, the survival of our institutions and our most basic rights. And Vietnam was an irrelevant, unclear and uncertain civil war fought half a world away by a tiny nation just emerging from the blights of colonialism and attempting to establish its own national character.

I had a unique tie to this period of unrest.

I was a very temporary composition instructor at K-State.

My wife and I are the parents of a then-professional military son who served with some distinction for 42 months in Vietnam.

I was also an activist who bought into the initial propaganda promoting the war until the surprise Tet Offensive by the Viet Cong revealed they moved freely in south Vietnam without fear of detection.

I did a 180-degree turn at that point, realizing, as millions of others did, that we were being deceived by our commanders.

Our son, unmarried during most of the Vietnam War, was rotated home early in summer 1968 to find me a member of a draft-Eugene-McCarthy-for-president group that promoted him for his uncompromising opposition to the war.

I explained our belief that the so-called good old boys urging him to "show them your guts" might mean their words literally, and they did not give a damn about him and his comrades or they would want them out of their untenable position.

These were the red, white and blue patriots who insisted because 50,000 had already died, 50,000 more should die so the first 50,000 would not have died in vain.

As an instructor, I had draft-age students, some of whom were ROTC enthusiasts, while others picketed ROTC drills.

Our son was serving as an adviser to Vietnamese military at that time.

One student pleaded with me to raise his grade — a passing one — in order to satisfy his draft board.

I helped in preparing a student's application for conscientious-objector status, but I would neither raise nor lower grades to influence a student's status.

I understand some faculty did, but my responsibility was heavy enough as it was, without playing God.

Granting an undeserved deferment simply meant sending some faceless, nameless, young person to take the place of a deferred.

Sometimes, in considering the futile agonies of Vietnam, I am led to postulate the effect on history had Sirhan Sirhan not encountered Robert Kennedy, or perhaps had Lee Harvey Oswald not been hidden in the Dallas Book Repository. Such numbing speculation is futile.

History records that President Nixon became president in 1969 and was commander-in-chief when — after extending our violence to Cambodia and Laos — we finally left the destruction behind us for the indigenous people of that devastated area to clean up.

Let all who would follow the Dole-Kemp lead in using the support of Vietnam as a kind of litmus test for the presidency consider the cost to Vietnamese civilians of our indiscriminate use of napalm from the sky and in tunnels from which their patriots came to defeat the French and resist the Americans.

Consider the mental anguish of our veterans who, after more than 30 years, seek to lessen their sorrows and regrets by making a new peace at the Vietnam memorial.

Consider our more than 50,000 dead and as many more confined to our veterans hospitals as their refuge from the world, which has shattered theirs.

And finally, let Dole recall the words often attributed to Samuel Johnson, author of the first English Dictionary.

After a first conventional definition, he would often follow with his own subjective one: patriotism — the last resort of a scoundrel.

America's electorate deserves a better performance from any who aspire to lead us.

Love in the Suds

Spin, tumble, fold and fall in love at the Laundromat

MY

Mary Renee SMITH

Your mother, most of your friends and I will agree on one thing: You are not going to find a lasting relationship at some smoky bar filled with intoxicated college students.

In the past I have advised not to date anyone you work with. I'll add to that: You shouldn't date anyone in your major.

Sure, you'll have lots in common. You'll have classes together. You'll study together. You'll have the same friends. You will see each other day and night, day in and day out. Can you see a problem here? At best you will get sick of each other, and at worst you will break up and make your lives miserable.

So where are you supposed to meet that person of your dreams?

My great-grandmother would suggest church. But that seems highly unlikely for most people I know, because that would involve actually attending a church-type place.

The best place to meet people is the Laundromat. (Because most of my experience is with picking up men, most of my observations are about the male of the species.)

Men at the Laundromat are doing their laundry. I know that is obvious, but if a guy is doing his own laundry it means no one else is doing his laundry. Someone such as perhaps a steady girlfriend or his mother.

You can tell what kind of undergarments a man wears by watching him do his laundry. Boxers, briefs or little lacy pink thongs, what a man has on under those clean jeans is important. The mere fact that he washes his underwear is a good sign.

Men at the Laundromat are doing their laundry.

I've said that.

But I know men who believe in wearing their jeans until the denim walks to the washing machine.

I have known men who wait for their towels to grow mold. If men aren't having sex in their bed, they don't think their sheets get dirty.

People go to the Laundromat in their natural state or at least as close to it as legally possible.

No one gets dressed up to do the wash. You wait until everything you own is dirty, throw it into the car and head out.

No one smells the best at the Laundromat.

No make-up, no freshly shaven faces, no hair-care products, just plain folks hanging out in the clothes they would never wear anywhere else.

It's not like a bar, where people look their best, and then when you see them the next morning, you wonder if that hideous, contorted human next to you is the same beauty you drooled over earlier.

Your choice of laundry soap, dryer sheets or fabric softener tells quite a bit about your personality. If a man is taking the time to put fabric softener in his wash, it might signify this guy is the type of man who dusts underneath his T.V. set and organizes his compact discs alphabetically.

If you are looking for this kind of anal retentiveness, great. If this breed of man makes you glad there is a waiting period for hand guns, then you would want to avoid the fabric-softener man.

What people do while their laundry does the tango with Tide shows a lot about their priorities. Those dedicated students are using their time wisely and hitting the books. The rest of us are cleaning out our cars, reading the funny pages and eating stale junk food.

Meeting quality new people is one of the hardest things to do in college. You might as well get your laundry done while you look.

U.S. hypocrisy in Iraq

Editor,

In 1991, a U.S.-led coalition attacked Iraq with the goal of stopping a country that threatened Kuwait's national sovereignty. In 1996, the United State's has again attacked Iraq. But where is the coalition this time?

There is not one, because, unknown to most Americans, this latest military operation has met with worldwide disapproval. What's their problem?

The more appropriate question is what is our problem? Iraq has used military force against the Kurds. The Kurds live in Iraq. Saddam Hussein is trying to squelch a rebellion.

Whether you agree with his methods is not important. What is important is by attacking Iraq, the United States is doing the same thing it fought to stop in 1991 — violating the national sovereignty of a country.

The United States' act would be akin to a situation in which Texas was trying to secede. The president would send down troops to stop it. And Brazil would come over and attack the United States. Even if the U.S. troops were committing atrocious acts in Texas, would that justify Brazilian involvement? Of course not, for the simple reason it's not their business.

This Clinton campaign strategy is a significant victory for Saddam Hussein. The United States has lost its Arab allies as a consequence of our actions. What happens now if Saddam does something that will require U.S. involvement? Will President Clinton balk, as not to look trigger happy?

A military campaign in Iraq was just way too hard to pass up for a president with a reputation of having no credibility in foreign affairs. This fresh screw-up proves it, although because the propaganda machine in America is running just as strongly as it is in Iraq, the full story might never be known.

The media have learned from past events that no matter how right or wrong a military operation is, you support your troops. But that doesn't mean the truth should be suppressed now, because this incident doesn't reflect on our troops, but Clinton himself.

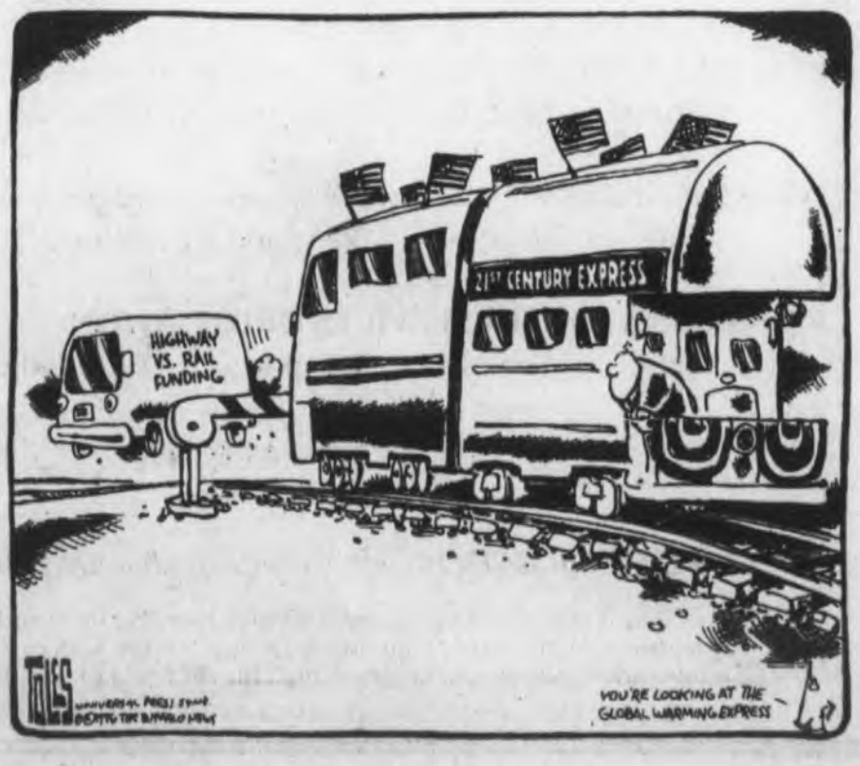
Iraq: History repeating itself?



Editor,

You really hit the nail on the head by asking the tough questions in the Sept. 5 editorial. We have every right to ask if the motives concerning our involvement in Iraq are political.

Thirty years ago I was attending K-State, and only within the past few years did I really learn that President Lyndon Johnson had political motives for our involvement in Vietnam. In 1966, I didn't question the motives. What a tragic loss and waste of young American lives just to fulfill his selfish political agenda. I fear history is repeating itself 30 years later. The names and the countries are different, but the agendas are the same.

Administration reviews effects of linear fees

HEATHER HOLLINGSWORTH
staff writer

Editor's note: This is the first in a series of five articles.

While the administration continues to evaluate rapidly fluctuating tuition, students have judged a system that reduced fees for some and raised fees for others.

The administration is reviewing the changes brought about by switching from flat fees to linear fees.

- The clear victors of the new system are students taking between 7 and 15 hours. Students taking seven hours this fall paid $442 less than they did last spring.
- The largest group of students on campus, those taking 15 hours, paid seven percent more than it did last spring. The increase was $62.
- Resident students taking above-average loads also found themselves paying more. A student taking 18 hours paid $883 last spring. This fall that same student paid $1,134, an increase of $251.
- Non-residents taking average to above-average loads paid a significantly larger amount. With the new system, students taking 15 hours paid $3,975, an increase of $233. Each hour on top of that added $265.
- Undergraduate in-state students taking graduate hours now have to pay $94 for each graduate hour.

With the linear fee-payment system, students are charged an hourly rate instead of a flat fee.

K-State also increased tuition by 6 percent. Three percent was a tuition increase mandated by the Kansas Board of Regents, and 3 percent was to offset tuition money the University was projecting it would lose because of the switch to this new method, Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president, said.

John Struve, budget office director, said there were two important reasons for the change.

The first reason was to correct tuition equity pricing, Struve said.

In the old system, students taking between seven and 12 hours paid a disproportionate amount.

The flat-fee system also encouraged a phenomenon dubbed shopping for classes, in which students enrolled in more hours than they planned to complete, Struve said.

Students are not the only ones experiencing changes in their budget. The administration is switching to tuition accountability, which includes a switch to linear fees.

The switch to tuition accountability was partly caused by a projected 20-percent increase in regents' school enrollment.

Before fiscal year 1997, the state controlled the University's tuition money, Struve said.

Tuition revenue was subtracted from the University's budget, and state funds become the difference, he said.

If the University increased tuition,

Read the chart to find out how much more or less you spent on tuition this fall, fiscal year 1997, than you did last spring, fiscal year 1996. Head count indicates the number of students taking that number of hours in fiscal year 1995. Undergraduates taking graduate hours pay $94 if they live in-state and $309 if they live out-of-state.

▶ TUITION REFUNDS

Drop/add students wait to be billed or refunded

DAVE KATZER
staff reporter

With the drop/add frenzy that takes place during the first two weeks of classes, the controller's office is going to let the dust settle before sending out any refund checks or bills for classes that were added.

With the introduction of the linear fee-payment system this year, when students drop or add a class, there is a change in their account balance with K-State but no immediate change, in terms of cash, in their pockets. Students don't have to write a check the day they add a class, but they do not receive one when they drop a course.

"When there is no financial aid involved, every transaction a student makes results in a difference in dollars. We have developed an addition to the office that identifies students who have a credit due to drop/add. There will be a two-week period at the beginning of the semester to let the dust settle," said R. Douglas Ackley, assistant controller for cashiers and student loans.

Basically, students who have gone through the drop/add process during the first two weeks of classes have their accounts set aside until the third week of the semester so there is no confusion as to how much they owe or how much they should receive in refunds.

Checks will be going out of the controller's office twice a week according to the regular refund schedule, after the initial two-week dormant period.

"The students have understood the linear fee structure pretty well. We haven't had any confusion and very few complaints. What they need to realize is the fluctuation in the assessments," Ackley said.

Some students don't seem to be too worried about their money or the new structure.

"It seems like a logical idea, and it

Chapter celebrates 50 years

KENNY WENTWORTH
staff writer

Not only celebrating the past, but also preparing for the future, was the attitude for the birthday of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship. The K-State chapter celebrated 50 years of serving students this weekend.

The celebration started Friday night at All Faiths Chapel as IVCF national president Steve Hayner addressed a crowd of students and alumni.

His message focused on how God is faithful through the ages, IVCF being a prime example.

"These have been years of chronicles of God's faithfulness here. I have tremendous hope for InterVarsity not because of our ability, but because God is God, and God is faithful," Hayner said.

As a way of relaying his message, he told stories of how he has witnessed this happening in his life. One of those dates back to his college years.

"When I was in college, we talked about sharing the good news so much it would last when our children were in college. When I went back for my 25th reunion, I ran into a friend. She reminded me of the prayer we prayed to keep a good Christian atmosphere at the school. Her daughter attended that same school, and when they got there, two students with IVCF shirts were some of the first students they saw," Hayner said.

Other events of the weekend included a brunch and formal meeting with Hayner on Saturday. About 70 alumni, one of whom was from the group that founded the K-State's chapter, attended the meeting.

"It was neat to see an 18-year-old and a 75-year-old share with one another their stories. Not only did we look back, but we also focused on the future," Stephanie Moser, former InterVarsity staff member, said.

Later that day , there was a picnic at City Park, and some members attended the football game after that.

Many of the alumni who returned for the weekend recalled memories of when they were involved in the group and how it has changed over the years.

"There are a lot more people in the group now. The music is also different. We used to use the organ and hymns. One thing that is still the same is the Bible studies. They were important, and I'm glad they still go on," said Kathy Reimer, 1966 graduate in elementary education.

Other alumni got a little more than what they expected from IVCF.

"It was in '56, and I was a freshman. I had a good friend that brought me to InterVarsity. Back then we used to meet in an auditorium in Anderson. I went to the meeting and met my future husband. He was the song leader then," Lois Mugler said.

That song leader is David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture. He and his wife have returned to help the group they were once a part of.

"It's been fun to be back and get involved. We often have Bible-study groups at our home. I really enjoy being there for them," Mugler said.

The weekend activities had an effect on the students in the group and how they can set the pace for the future.

Adrian Sealine, junior in agriculture business, said his favorite part was the large group Friday night.

"It liked it because it gave the alumni a feeling of how the group is now. It was so neat to talk to people that had been here in the '40s and hear the stories of what it was like then," Sealine said.

Students, tutors commended for work in TRIO programs

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff reporter

K-State students, staff and tutors from Educational Supportive Services came together Sunday at the City Park Poyntz Shelter for a picnic and celebration.

Kathleen Greene, director of Educational Supportive Services and the McNair Scholars program at K-State, talked about the changes in education that affected all their lives.

Greene's remarks prefaced speeches commending academic excellence by participants in the program. Tutors were also recognized for their contributions.

"At one time, the United States only helped provide education through the sixth grade," Greene told them. "What's important to us is that the U.S. made a commitment to individuals, regardless of their background, by passing legislation that brought about the TRIO programs."

The original TRIO programs are Talent Search, starting in middle school; Upward Bound, aimed at high-school students; and Student Support Services, for college students. All three provide access to educational programs. They are aimed at encouraging low-income students to teach at the college level.

TRIO has expanded, adding programs to help adults get back to school, but it has kept its original name. Programs are designed for students meeting federal income guidelines, first-generation college students or those with disabilities.

At K-State, these services are provided under the umbrella of Educational Supportive Services. There, a multitude of challenges can be met and overcome with the help of staff and tutors. Many staff members work with more than one aspect of the program.

Greene's comment, "They like to work a lot," brought laughter from the staff.

Another group of people who work with the students are the tutors. Geoff Doane said he is firmly convinced he could not make it without tutors.

"Absolutely. They're great," said Doane, a former Army helicopter pilot and senior in business, who was recognized for earning a grade point average of 4.0.

The goal of all the programs is academic excellence. Of 80 participants who maintained a GPA of 3.0 or above, 20 had a GPA of 3.5 or higher.

Lisa Guerra, an elementary education major who was recognized for scholastic achievement, said the challenge was balancing the demands of college with a home and a child. She said it's a matter of priorities.

"Student services has been wonderful," Guerra said.

The McNair scholarship program, established in 1986 and named after astronaut Ronald E. McNair, was established at K-State last year. Twenty students qualified, and 11 did sponsored research projects. They were provided with stipends so that they could focus on their research and not have to work another job.

Shanté Moore, a senior in political science, is a McNair scholar. Moore said he first became aware of the program when someone suggested he apply because of his interest in doing research.

"I went and talked to the people, applied for the scholarship and was awarded it. It was a matter of being at the right place in the right time," Moore said.

Nationally, there are 99 member schools in the scholarship program. "That can really open doors for K-State students," Greene said.

Sycamores fall to Wildcats 59-3

TODD STEWART
sports writer

For Indiana State coach Dennis Raetz, it was simple.

"I think Kansas State is a better football team than we are. Period. They've got stronger players. They've got faster players. They've got more players," Raetz said. "They're better than we are, and they'll beat us if we play them 10 more times."

But led by sophomore running back Marlon Charles, it took K-State only one game to get its point across, a 59-3 rout of Indiana State Saturday.

On 33 carries and three touchdowns scored, Charles put up the fourth-best rushing total by a Wildcat running back ever, 195 yards.

Starting quarterback Brian Kavanagh said Charles' outburst was not unexpected.

"He's got all the talent in the world," Kavanagh said.

It wasn't Charles, however, who got the rushing game started.

Charles' blocking fullback, Brian Goolsby, started the scoring on a 15-yard touchdown run midway through the first quarter. A 33-yard Jamie Rheem field goal later, it was Kavanagh's turn in the spotlight.

After the K-State defense forced Indiana State to punt, the Cats took over at the Sycamore 36-yard line, and Kavanagh didn't waste any time.

On the next play, Kavanagh never took his eyes off wide receiver Kevin Lockett streaking down the right sideline and when Sycamore cornerback Dre' Knox bit on a pump fake, Lockett was all alone in the back of the end zone.

That score put the Cats up 17-0. The Sycamores never mounted a serious challenge.

Charles then went to work on the ground for the rest of the game as second- and third-stringers shuffled in and out of the lineup.

Cornerback Chris Canty said he loves it when the backups get their chance to shine.

"Our second team came out and played a good game, and that was our focus," Canty said. "You can give them all the reps in the world in practice, but they need experience."

Leading the list of players seeing his first-game action was true-freshman quarterback Jonathan Beasley.

Beasley came in for Kavanagh in the third quarter and led K-State on two scoring drives, the second capped off with a 57-yard touchdown hook-up to back-up receiver Troy Hackney.

After the game, Kavanagh raved about Beasley.

"Jonathan, he's got all the talent. He's got a cannon for an arm," Kavanagh said.

Beasley said he only knows about one-fourth of the K-State playbook, so everything is a learning experience for him.

"I'm still learning. There are still plays to learn," Beasley said.

Kavanagh said Beasley is a quick learner, and after the game K-State coach Bill Snyder confirmed Beasley is now his No. 2 quarterback.

Now the focus for Beasley and the Cats is preparing for Cincinnati, a team much different than NCAA Division I-AA Indiana State.

Snyder said his team should have no problem getting up for the Cincinnati game.

"This is a subdued win, so to think, and rightfully so," Snyder said. "They're anxious to get it on."

Lockett said the team is ready for Cincinnati, a team the Cats needed last-minute heroics to beat a year ago.

"They're looking to come in and upset us," Lockett said. "We're looking forward to it."

2nd-annual Shootout deemed a success

■ Sigma Phi Epsilon philanthropy raises $1,100 for charity.

SETH GURSS
staff reporter

The golfers waited and waited, but the balls never came.

After a slight delay due to missing golf balls, the final round of the Second Annual Sig Ep Shootout started on the 145-yard 17th hole at Stagg Hill Golf Course Friday night.

Matt Elliot, tournament director, said for the second year in a row the tournament was a success.

"It went real well. We had a lot of participants this year, and a lot of money was raised," Elliot said.

The Shootout is Sigma Phi Epsilon's philanthropy and is a closest-to-the-pin tournament.

The qualifying rounds took place at four different courses in the Manhattan area. The participants who had the three closest shots to the hole at each course moved on to the final round.

Tim Sweemer, retired Ogden city council member, won first prize — two travel bags from Dillard's and $25.

Sweemer was the closest to the pin with a shot that left his ball about three feet from the hole.

Each golfer qualified for the final round either Aug. 25-26 or Sept. 1-2, by wagering $1-10 they could hit the ball on the green.If the golfer was successful, the Sig Eps matched the bet. If the golfers missed the green, they lost the bet.

Friday evening, the 10 qualifying golfers were given three shots at the green to see who could hit the ball closest to the hole. Sweemer was the closest to the pin. Topeka resident Nick Hahn placed second.

Don Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, was also a contestant in the shootout, although he did not place among the top five in the final round Friday.

Rathbone qualified for the final round as one of three closest to the hole at Manhattan Country Club.

"The members in my group put up the money, and I just got lucky," Rathbone said.

Even though nobody hit a hole-in-one to win a 1997 Chevrolet Camaro from Murdock Auto Mall, all of the contestants received consolation prizes donated by area businesses.

The Sig Eps raised a total of $1,100.

Ninety percent of the proceeds will go to the Big Lakes Developmental Center, and the other 10 percent went to area junior golf programs.

RON HILL, of Junction City, tries to remotely influence the course of his golf ball Friday evening during the Sig Ep Shootout at Stagg Hill Golf Course. Hill placed fourth out of the 10 who competed in the shootout.

▶ CROSS COUNTRY

Women finish 1st, men finish 2nd

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

If it had been a surprise party, K-State cross country coach Terry Drake would have been — surprised.

As it was, there was no surprise party, only a coming-out party for the more inexperienced members of the Wildcats' cross country teams as the women's team took first place and the men's side second on Saturday at Baker University's Wildcat Invitational.

Led by junior Anita Hallauer and freshman Kelly Andra, the Wildcat women had five runners finish in the top nine of the meet.

"Anita Hallauer was a big surprise," Drake said. "I think we've seen that we've got three solid runners competing for the third or fourth spots on the team."

Hallauer and Andra finished first and second respectively for the Cats, while senior Ann Golubski finished fourth, freshman Emily Diederich finished sixth and junior Lisa Kaul finished ninth.

"I was pleasantly surprised by Emily Diederich, considering that she's usually an 800-meter runner," Drake said. "I think that was definitely a positive. Lisa Kaul did rather well, especially when you consider it was only the second race in her career at K-State."

On the men's side, sophomores Zach Davies and Brent Stover led the pack, with Davies finishing third and Stover ninth. Sophomores Reid Bauersfeld and David Barland and senior Ryan Johnson also finished in the top 20.

Drake said while he was happy with the Cats' performance, he believes the team could do better.

"The men's side wasn't quite as good (as the women's)," Drake said. "I think maybe I would have liked to have seen them run a little faster."

> • TERRY DRAKE
> K-STATE CROSS COUNTRY COACH

But experience is the key, Drake said, and that was the purpose of the meet — to give the runners experience. He said he thinks it might have paid off with Davies, who ran a 15:44 time.

"Zach probably could have run a little faster, but he got a little behind late in the race," Drake said. "He needs to learn how to read the other runners. It was his inexperience."

The men's side also had its share of surprises. Drake said he hadn't expected Bauersfeld to run as well as he did.

"He'll be a good No. 7 runner," he said.

Also surprising Drake were Stover and Barland, two athletes who have been battling injuries. Stover dealt with a case of tendinitis over the summer, and Barland had a stress fracture.

"Barland had a nice, steady little race," Drake said. "It was surprising to see those two come in and run well."

The Cats will compete Saturday at the Jayhawk Invitational in Lawrence.

Drake said with the exception of freshman Kathryn Wolfram, he expects to send his best runners.

"She's got a strained hamstring, and I'd like to be cautious with her," Drake said. "She's too good."

Netters fall to 6-1 with loss to Ohio St.

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

The K-State volleyball team improved to 6-1 last weekend, finishing second at the Rice Invitational. The Wildcats went 2-1, defeating Oregon and Rice, but losing to No. 15 Ohio State.

Coach Jim Moore said his team played up and down in the tournament.

"At times we played very, very good," Moore said. "Then against Ohio State we didn't play so good at all."

K-State lost to Ohio State in three straight games, 15-9, 15-9 and 15-12.

Moore said his team's performance against OSU might be due to its lack of rest and preparation time for the game.

"I don't believe them being ranked the 15th-best team in the country had a thing to do with how we did," Moore said. "I really believe that getting to bed late the night before and playing early the next morning affected us."

K-State played Rice Friday night and didn't get to bed until 11:30 p.m. The Cats then had be awake by 8:30 Saturday morning to prepare for Ohio State.

Moore said Ohio State's other matches in the tournament proved it wasn't as good a team as the score showed in the K-State match.

"Ohio State went five games with Oregon and had some trouble with Rice," Moore said. "We buried Oregon and Rice when we played them."

The loss to Ohio State affected the Cats mentally, Moore said.

"After the Ohio State game, it was like all of our confidence had been lost," Moore said. "Luckily we were able to put things back together for the next game against Oregon."

Against Oregon, K-State set a three-game match school high of 64 kills and 61 assists. Junior setter Devon Ryning had 60 assists to help lead the Wildcats to a 15-9, 15-13, 15-3 sweep over the Ducks.

The Cats also defeated Rice in three games, 15-7, 15-6 and 15-13.

Play-set-hitter Toie Young led the Cats with 10 kills, followed by middle blocker Kate DeClerk with nine.

Although DeClerk and swing hitter Kim Zschau made the all-tournament team, Moore said none of his players had an outstanding tournament.

"From a players standpoint, we were really spotty," Moore said. "One player would have a great game, but then another player wouldn't.

"I think that shows a lot about our team in itself. You can see that we're not firing on all cylinders now, but we're winning. I think it will be pretty scary if several of our players get on a roll."

Russians teach students traditional folk dance

arts and entertainment editor

Despite the language barrier, they were eager to walk up and shake your hand.

The Vesna Voronezh Russian Folk Dancers and Musicians performed at McCain Auditorium Friday evening.

"They were friendly. They had no airs about them," Joyce Yagerline, assistant professor of dance, said.

Dancers displayed traditional Russian folk art on tables in the McCain foyer.

"I thought they had a lot of energy and enthusiasm," Yagerline said.

Dressed in traditional red costumes, the dancers greeted the audience with smiles and laughter.

"They were young, but they had very nice technique. The men were strong, agile and very athletic," Yagerline said.

Vesna dancers also participated in a theater and dance class Wednesday with K-State students.

Janusz Jaworski, senior in speech education, worked with the Russian dancers.

"I worked with mostly the guys. I was the only guy there, so they kind of team-taught me," Jaworski said.

"I wasn't at all used to their style. It was very low to the ground," Jaworski said.

The men used gymnastic aspects in their dance, showing off their remarkable athletic ability and unusual dance technique.

They would start out very low to the ground, squatting, and then jump up and squat again, Jaworski said.

"A few of them knew a little English. They would be ringleaders and try to explain the movement in words. Most of the words they knew were 'That's good' and 'Now try again,'" Jaworski said.

The dancing was unique, but the traditional Russian folk dancing style still held aspects of classical dance.

"In contrast to the more refined dancing of ballet, they used their whole foot or the heel of one of their feet. It was a grounded-type dancing, more of a people's-type dance. This seemed a little more in touch with the earth," Jaworski said.

Their dance varied from traditional Russian folk dance to a more modern style that seemed to reflect their generation of dancers.

"The group seems to have traditional Russian folk dancing, but also aspects of balletic skills. They also bring in more of a colloquial courting dance and a drinking song," said Vera Orlock, assistant professor of dance.

Vesna gives a picture of the past and present of folk dance.

"I think if you look at it that they're representing more of their culture than just their historic culture. It's very stylized and quaint," Orlock said.

"What they considered modern is what here in the United States we consider jazz dance," Yagerline said.

Vesna will also perform at the Kansas State Fair before it leaves Kansas.

"Dance transcends language and the boundaries of countries," Yagerline said. "Hopefully in the future the K-State dance program can be involved in this exchange."

A RUSSIAN dancer from the Vesna Voronezh Russian Folk Dancers and Musicians performs a folk dance at McCain Auditorium Friday night. The group is touring across Kansas and will perform at the Kansas State Fair.

Online users pay for dial-in services

MISSY SNODGRASS
staff reporter

The increased number of Internet assignments professors give and the mainstream flooding to the World Wide Web have caused K-State's computer dial-in service to take off.

The telecommunications department has revamped its program to provide better services for students and faculty. Last year, there was no charge for the service nor a limitation to the number of hours a user could be online. The department charges for dial-in service this year.

The department has three plans to choose from. A student or faculty member can buy 15 hours of connection time for $5 a month, 80 hours for $10 or an unlimited number of hours for $110. The first two plans charge 50 cents for each additional hour.

Many greek organizations are online through campus. Alpha Xi Delta is among the group.

"The house doesn't mind paying this year at all. Last year, it was a pain getting through. the lines were always busy. Maybe this year it will be easier," said Holly Glover, senior in elementary education and Alpha Xi Delta member.

The dial-in service provides a connection to K-State's campus network from the user's personal computer using a modem and phone line.

The only other requirement is a software toolkit that can be purchased for $15 when signing up for the service or copied for free in a public computing lab on campus.

About 40-50 students a day stop by East Stadium 109 to sign up for their own connection to the Web, according to Dylan Zehr, database and systems administrator. About 1,400 users are registered.

The department has hooked up 96 lines. When usage increases, it will add another 48 lines.

"We want to eliminate the busy signals so students can call in and get their work done," Fred Damkroger, director of telecommunications, said.

A meter records how many off-campus users there are every hour.

"The highest that we've gotten so far is around 85 a hour," Zehr said.

Damkroger said the 80-hour plan is the most popular plan for students.

"I will most likely sign up for the 80-hour plan," Tiffany Boyle, senior in accounting, said. "I've never really had a chance to go online before, but if it's at home, I can use it in my free time."

Students can register for the service two ways. Zehr said he recommends that students who have questions or concerns come in person to East Stadium 109.

Once the forms are filled out, a password needs to be assigned. This will be a temporary password, which will need to be changed the first time the user goes online.

"This is to give as much security to the account as possible," Damkroger said.

One clear distinction that should be made is that students need to report to the basement of Fairchild Hall for an e-mail address and password and East Stadium 109 for a dial-in connection and password. Damkroger said he recommends the passwords be different.

If there is a problem connecting to the network, the user should call the telecommunications department at 532-7300 and ask for technical support. If there is a problem after the connection is made, the user must call Computing and Network Services at 532-7722 and ask for computer assistance.

"The technical support staff consists of all graduate or undergraduate students in CIS," Eric Caruthers, senior in computer information services, said. The office operates 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. E-mail can be sent to (telecom@telecom.ksu.edu). Caruthers said a response is normally given by 8 a.m. the next day.

"We are trying to provide a better service for a charge. About 1,000 people have signed up in the last two to three weeks," Zehr said. "We expect another 1,000 by the end of the semester."

doesn't affect my scheduling at all. If I drop a class, I know the money will be there eventually," Andrew Vocasek, freshman in theater, said.

The controller's office said there are four refund periods each semester. To receive a full refund, a class had to be dropped by Aug. 30. A 90-percent refund was available until Friday. If a class is dropped by Sep. 20, a student is entitled to a 50-percent refund, but no refund after that date.

Students have to decide if they want to stay in a class.

"I think by the second week, people should know what they're going to do," Vocasek said.

Patience is the virtue students will need to exercise early this semester.

If a refund is expected, it will soon be on its way. But if money is owed, expect the bill with the same expediency.

majors interesting. Richard Hendricks, a senior in engineering, and Chiquita Hishaw, a sophomore in pre-nursing, were both drawn to booths dealing with their future professions.

"I'm looking at the Sun Rays booth because solar energy is interesting to me, being an engineer," Hendricks said.

"I joined the pre-nursing club," Hishaw said. "I got information on the club and when the next meeting will be."

For clubs, this is an opportunity to make themselves known to students at the beginning of the year and to get students to join their group.

Sheldon Murphy, senior, in accounting and president of the Future Entrepreneurs Club, said students who come to the club's booth can sign up to be on the club's mailing list to get more information, find out about the next meeting and get a brief overview of the club's goals and missions. Murphy hopes to raise his club's membership from eight to about 20.

"This carnival helps us to get our name out," said Murphy. "We're looking to expand our club to twice its size by the end of the semester, and this carnival gives us a good start."

Membership lists for many of the clubs did benefit from the event, said Tanya Nisly, the UPC promotions chairperson.

"The carnival has been very successful," Nisly said.

"Some booths have had 60 people sign up, and some have had 30. Most people at the booths just said a lot of people signed up. They didn't even want to count."

Neighborhood supports local park opening

ANDREW FRANCIS
staff reporter

Stagg Hill Park, a new two-acre park in southern Manhattan, was officially opened and dedicated Saturday.

"This is part of our goal to make Manhattan the best and the best better," Mayor Sydney Carlin said.

The park, which consists of a playground and walking trail, has been built for about a year. Dedication ceremonies were put on hold until the parking lot could be finished, said Terry DeWeese, director of the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

The City of Manhattan purchased the land for the park, which is just off Gillespie Drive near the west end of Irene Street, from the developer of the surrounding Stagg Hill neighborhood.

"The neighborhood has been excellent to work with and very supportive of the park," DeWeese said.

Residents of the neighborhood saw a need for a park when two children were killed while playing in the street. The incidents were unrelated.

Since there are no schools close to Stagg Hill, children had no playgrounds within walking or biking distance.

Mayor Carlin said it is important to provide safer places for the children to play. Before the park was built, children played in vacant lots, but neighborhood growth and construction made vacant lots rare and unsafe.

The neighborhood worked with the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board to plan the development of the park.

"Once we have the parks established, they can be maintained for future generations. Parks are tax dollars that can be seen," said Mike Toy, a member of the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board.

Manhattan has 21 city parks with a total of 568 acres of land. Three parks have been built in the past two years.

FEES

and nothing else intervened, the budget would remain the same. The state would just proportionately pay less, he said.

Reduced enrollment equals decreased tuition. When this happened, the state made up the difference through a process called back-fill, he said.

"If our revenues drop by $200,000, the state would come back and increase state funding for the non-tuition part by $200,000," he said. "Our budget would remain the same totally — the funding mix of the budget changed — but the total budget remained the same."

In the past, the University has faced two problems with the enrollment-adjustment process, he said.

When enrollment increased in the early 1990s, the amount the enrollment-adjustment formula generated for the University was $4.7 million. But, the Kansas Legislature said the request was too large. Instead of getting $4.7 million, the University received about $2.5 million, he said.

The second problem with the process is a university must grow a certain amount before it qualifies for an enrollment adjustment.

"If an institution grows continuously but by small amounts each year, they will never be able to get into the enrollment-adjustment process," he said. "Over time, a university can have a significant increase in enrollment and zero extra dollars from the state."

In response to University needs, tuition accountability was put into effect at the University of Kansas and K-State.

Tuition accountability allows the University to keep one-fourth of the tuition revenue created by tuition-rate increases.

A second component of tuition accountability will allow the University to keep all revenue resulting from enrollment growth to finance the additional costs of higher enrollment.

This was $276,940 for K-State in fiscal year 1997, according to the Governor's Budget Report.

These two components allow the University to plan for growth instead of requesting State General Fund monies.

One provision of tuition accountability is a change to linear fee payment. Instead of using head count to determine growth, the University now uses student credit hour, Struve said.

"We have to know how many dollars we generate for ourselves by enrollment growth," he said.

"In order to do that you have to have a direct relationship between a credit hour and a dollar."

WHEAT

Charles Leister said.

Quality tests on Kansas hard red winter wheat showed a 13.3-percent protein average and an average test weight of 60.3 pounds per bushel, Frey said.

The Kansas Wheat Commission reports that this protein average is one-tenth of a percent below the 1989 crop, which was the highest in the past 12 years.

The high poundage per bushel qualifies the wheat for grade No. 1, the highest possible. The grade is also based on wheat characteristics such as kernel size, amount of foreign material present and amount of broken kernels.

Ruckman said 57 percent of the wheat tested by the Kansas Grain Inspection Department was graded No. 1.

"The combination of these two things is a one-two punch. We have a right to brag," Frey said.

As a result of the low yield, however, Kansas farmers will not benefit from the high quality of wheat harvested.

teaching.

"These changes will make us rethink how we teach, how we advise, how we do research, how we evaluate students and how we evaluate faculty," he said.

Wefald remains an optimist.

"The main reason that I am optimistic is that we have superior faculty, students, and administrators," he said. "I think we have problem solvers on all levels. If you have good people, you can create miracles."

Other faculty members had a chance to respond afterward. Dennis Kuhlman, professor in biological and agricultural engineering, stressed Wefald's stance on salaries.

"We have great faculty," he said. "We also have the lowest salary. We are at the bottom 20 percent in the nation in terms of salaries. We have one of the lowest percentages of full professors in terms of overall faculty. We are just a stepping stone.

"Look at what we've done in the past, look at where we are now, and look at where we could go if we kept those rising stars," he said. "We're a great university, but we could be an outstanding university."

Verdict still out on fad diet products

ASHLEY WEEKLY
staff reporter

Diet supplements, energy enhancers and herbal remedies are all fad diets on the market promising large amounts of weight loss in a relatively short amount of time.

Tom Boggs, junior in biology and pre-medicine, has done research on several local fad diets being advertised. Boggs said he has found many of the local and national diets advertised in Manhattan use the product Herbalife.

"I am concerned about the public because of the lack of awareness they have on the dangers these products can cause," Boggs said.

Herbalife says it is regulated and maintained by people with doctorates. Herbalife was started in 1980 and is now offered in 33 countries. It is said to be 100 percent herbs and is supposed to increase energy levels.

"Herbalife is designed to boost your metabolism and suppress your appetite and cravings," Linda Hulquist, independent Herbalife distributor, said.

Herbalife and other diets say they work by increasing the metabolism rate through a process called thermojetics.

The process works by increasing metabolism so you burn calories at a faster rate.

Fad diets replace meals with shakes or suggest taking a tablet two times a day.

"Anytime it is a magical cure-all in a short amount of time, you should put up a red flag," Dianna Schalles, instructor of dietetics, said.

Schalles said that when people do not get all the calories their bodies need throughout the day, it actually slows down metabolism and takes water weight from the body. The body then starves for protein and takes muscle tissue for energy.

"Healthy weight loss is gradual. As a registered dietitian we recommend losing 1 pound a week. Any more is water and muscle," Schalles said.

"If you are decreasing your caloric value enough to lose 5 pounds a week, you are not getting the vitamins and minerals you need. There is going to be a deficiency," Janette Gehler, Lafene Health Center dietitian, said.

Gehler said that although she never tells her patients not to go on fad diets, she would never recommend it.

"I have lots of patients where their diet hasn't worked, or maybe it did, and as soon as they went off the product, they gained the weight back," Gehler said.

Gehler said there are only a few ways to lose weight.

"A diet is a diet. We're not talking about something that can be done in a short amount of time," Gehler said.

Gehler believes in following three guidelines for a healthy diet with lasting results. She advises following the food pyramid that nutritionists and dietitians recommend, keeping realistic food portions and remaining active. The food pyramid consists of different quantities and types of food from all the food groups.

"A real diet is a change in lifestyle and not just taking a magic pill. It is not about a fad diet. A healthy diet is based more on the nutritional pyramid. It takes work," Schalles said.

For $29.95 Hulquist said her patients on Herbalife can lose 15-20 pounds a week. She said people on Herbalife can lose twice the weight they could on a regular diet. Hulquist said the products were safe to use and had no side effects.

Hulquist said the product was registered by the Food and Drug Administration as a safe product.

Susan Shearer, a Manhattan Herbalife distributor, said Herbalife did not need to be registered by the FDA because it is not a drug. It was only recommended by the FDA.

An FDA spokesperson said there is a difference between being registered and recommended by the FDA. A product no registered and only recommended by the FDA is not guaranteed to be safe.

Shearer said her company ensures good nutrition for its clients while on the diet. She said Herbalife contains 38 of the 40 minerals and vitamins needed for a healthy body and she feels confident about the product.

U.S. approves Turkish troop advance

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — Secretary of State Warren Christopher gave Turkey a green light Sunday to send troops into northern Iraq as a buffer zone against attacks on Turkish territory by Kurdish guerrillas.

He stressed that the zone along the 200-mile border should be thin and temporary. Ankara has said it plans to enforce a security zone as wide as 12 miles along the mountainous border.

This week, Turkey conducted an air attack against the rebels, members of the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, who have fought for 12 years to carve an independent state out of parts of southeastern Turkey. The United States considers the PKK a terrorist organization.

"The Turks have genuine reasons to be concerned about their border and the PKK," Christopher said.

He also praised Turkey for supporting the United States in keeping the skies over northern Iraq free of Iraqi warplanes.

Turkish Foreign Minister Tansu Ciller sent President Clinton a letter this week notifying him of the security-zone plan, which would be defended with heavy artillery and aircraft. Turkish officials have not said how many troops would be sent into Iraq.

Even while attacking Iraq with cruise missiles, the Clinton administration has said it supports Iraq's territorial integrity. Some critics of the U.S. assault have warned it could destabilize Iraq and the Persian Gulf region itself.

hours," Cole said.

All this political work is an extension of school for some of these students.

"This is exactly what we're learning about," Keating said.

She said she has a political communication class in the speech department that covers many of the things she works with in the Democratic Party.

Glendening also said he learned things that were similar to what he learns in classes.

"This summer, I've become very in tune to the specific differences in parties," he said.

Other students gained new skills they think will help them after college.

Cole wants to work for a representative or senator in Washington, D.C.

"My research skills have really been honed," Cole said. "I have learned to access information and then condense it. There are large, large pieces of legislation you have to condense."

Chilen said she has learned public-relations skills.

"I set up photo sessions and things like that," she said. "I like to do more things like scheduling and personal assisting."

Glendening said he wants to study agricultural law. He said learning first-hand how government works will give him a good basis for law school.

Zamrzla, who is also assistant residence-life coordinator of Moore Hall, said many aspects of his career and his volunteer work on Peterson's campaign coincide.

He said he uses communication and organizational skills in both roles.

"I sort of got into this career because I enjoy helping people succeed," he said.

and chair of the K-State College Republicans, happens to be Kassebaum's great-niece. She worked as an intern in her great-aunt's Washington, D.C., office over the summer.

"She was great to work for," Ruckert said. "She has won a lot of respect on both sides of the aisle."

She said Washington Monthly, a local Washington, D.C., magazine, recently rated Kassebaum the nicest senator in its survey of the U.S. Congress.

Ruckert sees Kassebaum at family gatherings on holidays.

"She's always very casual — it's surprising when you see her," Ruckert said. "She's very gracious, and she remembers a lot of details about people you wouldn't think she would remember."

President Jon Wefald said he's worked with Kassebaum most closely with organizing speakers for the Landon Lectures.

Wefald said Kassebaum has worked to bring members of the President Clinton's cabinet and congress to K-State for the lecture series.

"She helped us get $12-13 million for Throckmorton Hall from the U.S. Senate," Wefald said.

"She's also made sure that financial aid isn't whittled down to nothing since 80 percent of our students are on financial aid."

"She will not be easily replaced," he said. "To say she will be missed is an understatement."

PRESIDENT JON WEFALD presents U.S. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., with the first-ever Medal of Excellence following her Landon Lecture Monday morning. Kassebaum's lecture was the 107th in the Landon series.

More than 1,300 students attend senator's Landon Lecture kick-off

Inside

What does the future hold for a 10,894-acre tallgrass prairie? Kassebaum continues to work for protective legislation for the Z-Bar Ranch.

Fred Phelps led a protest outside Kassebaum's lecture, but he said he still thinks K-State is OK.

Returning to the state she calls home to deliver a lecture named for her father, Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum spoke Monday of a small-town America that is fading, even from Kansas.

Kassebaum's presentation of the 107th Landon Lecture, named for her father, Gov. Alf Landon, means even more to the senator because she delivered it on her father's birthday, 30 years after he delivered the first lecture. Alf Landon died in 1987.

So it was fitting for Kassebaum to come home to talk about life in the United States and her 18 years in the U.S. Senate.

"The disintegration of our communities has been assisted by the high mobility of people and families moving from city to city," Kassebaum said. "The flight of talent and businesses from our inner cities and the weakening of Main Street in our small towns has been made possible by the ability to drive the family car or take mass transit to large shopping malls frequently in the suburbs."

Intertwined in Kassebaum's appeal for community were thoughts about family issues.

"While the breakdown in our families and the general decline in civic involvement have many causes, there can be no doubt that every hour spent watching television is an hour not spent playing with children or talking with family or volunteering in church or community activities," she said.

Kassebaum also spoke for more community and personal involvement in governmental issues, saying, "If leaders at all levels pull together with citizens, we can open the way to an era of civic revival."

She also took aim at negative campaigning and attack ads as popular with campaign managers but adversely affecting a national discourse on real issues.

In an appeal to the audience, which included two Kansas Board of Regents members and Gov. Bill Graves, Kassebaum spoke of the need to strengthen education in the country.

"Quality and excellence in education couldn't be more important to us," she said.

"Government can't solve that problem, it has to come from our own families and communities that we demand quality."

"We do a great disservice to those students on financial aid who come to college to take remedial reading," Kassebaum said. "That's not your fault. It's our fault."

Kassebaum concluded her speech with a special thanks to friends and family who have been supportive during her tenure in the Senate.

"I have been proud and honored to serve Kansas for 18 years," she said as her voice grew uneven.

Following her conclusion, President Jon Wefald presented her with a newly-commissioned Medal of Excellence.

"This handsome medal is the ultimate tribute that Kansas State University can give a person for the excellence they have shown for a long time," Wefald said.

He also unveiled the Nancy Landon Kassebaum scholarship program. He said it will be the most prestigious scholarship offered to students of this state.

SURROUNDED BY MEDIA, Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., responds to questions about the possibility of marriage plans once she retires from the Senate. Kassebaum said on Monday afternoon in McCain Auditorium that she has no plans to get married after she retires. She delivered a Landon Lecture on what would have been the 109th birthday of her father, Alf Landon. The lecture series is named after Landon, a former Kansas governor who ran for president against Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Thefts from cars might be preventable

KELLY FURNAS
staff writer

According to a study by Royal Insurance, a quarter of all recorded crimes of thefts are from cars.

Sgt. Stanley Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department said protecting oneself from car theft is mostly common sense. He suggests not advertising products that thieves could want.

"Don't leave things visible that they might want," he said. "Keep things like CDs, cellular phones out of sight, and always keep your doors locked."

Although it is a good idea to keep valuables out of sight, Conkwright stresses keeping vehicles in sight.

"Always park your car in heavily foot-trafficked or lighted areas," he said. "Never park your car where a thief might find it inviting."

Conkwright said security alarms work well in deterring crime but have lost their effectiveness in recent years.

"The problem with security alarms are that people don't always check them if they go off," he said. "If an alarm goes off, a passerby might glance over, but won't go check it out.

"If you see somebody messing around, call the police department," he said. "We need help knowing what's going on."

Stacie Daniels, freshman in elementary education, said her stereo was stolen from her car when she forgot to remove the detachable face.

"I got in an accident and my car had to be towed," she said. "I had a new stereo in my car, but I didn't even think about removing the face before it was towed."

Her car was consequently broken into, vandalized, and her stereo was stolen.

"Now I take the face off my stereo whenever I leave my car for any length of time," she said.

Although Daniels said she agreed with Conkwright that valuables should not be left in sight, she went further to say they should not even be left in the car.

"You shouldn't have anything too nice in your car," she said, "or you should be willing to accept the possibility that it might get stolen."

If items are stolen from a vehicle, Conkwright said the victim should contact the police department and have as much information as possible.

"Be sure to be able to identify your belongings," he said. "We have a lot of property at the station that we can't return to the owners because we can't identify it."

Brownback recalls his Student Senate battles at K-State

DEBBIE HOLLIS
staff reporter

U.S. Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Manhattan, still remembers his days as a K-State leader, even in the middle of his campaign for U.S. Senate.

Brownback, the Republican candidate in the race to replace Bob Dole, was student body president at K-State in 1978-79.

Brownback in 1977

During his campaign in spring 1978, Brownback suggested a $20,000 federally funded feasibility study of a mass-transit shuttle system to tackle the parking problem.

He also said every student living in the residence halls should have access to parking, according to the Feb. 9, 1978, issue of the Collegian. Parking for people who live on campus is now available in lot B-2.

However, parking is still a problem at K-State because it is an issue of convenience, Brownback said.

"The only solution I see now would be a large parking garage south of the K-State Student Union," he said.

The renovation of Nichols Gym was also a hot issue. A fire gutted the building in 1968. Ten years later, the administration wanted to tear down the shell of the building.

"That was in direct opposition to what the students wanted," Brownback said. "We had a big brawl with the administration over it."

If the administration had torn down Nichols, K-State would have lost some of its most beautiful architecture, he said. After a struggle with the administration, Student Governing Association was able to save Nichols from destruction.

Brownback said the library was controversial as well.

"We fought the administration on that, too," Brownback said. Surveys indicated K-State's library ranked below peer institutions in space and volumes, yet the administration did nothing, Brownback said.

The administration seemed to be paralyzed on the issues, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said. Bosco was student body president in 1970-71 and SGA adviser during Brownback's term.

"In the '70s, it wasn't as much an adversarial relationship as much as it was the fact the administration didn't have focus," Bosco said. "That focus came from SGA crystallizing the issues."

Today, the administration and SGA have a rhythm and share a vision, Bosco said.

"I agree," Brownback said. "The University is operating more as a team now than what it was."

Farrell Library is an example of that, he said.

Orientation informs residents of educational resources

▶ The College of Arts and Sciences is planning residence hall discussion groups with peers to prevent failure and increase retention rates.

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

The towel of failure is too often thrown in. Sometimes a course that seems impossible can be tackled with a little help from your friends.

This semester, the College of Arts and Sciences is planning to give students living in residence halls the opportunity to meet with peers at discussion sessions on how to study for certain courses before it's too late.

On the evening before classes started, arts and science ambassadors joined resident assistants to talk to students about issues such as time management, drop/add, finding resources, using tutoring services and getting to know an adviser.

"In my opinion, the main push was letting students know resources were available," said Keri Stoner, junior in nutrition and exercise science and resident assistant in West Hall.

The program that William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, arranged was modeled from the new student orientation in the College of Engineering. Feyerharm worked with Thomas Roberts, assistant dean of the College of Engineering, who began the engineering new-student orientation three years ago.

Roberts said the program is centered around efforts to improve retention, create success, decrease class retakes and save students money in doing so.

"I'm trying to cut down on long lines here in the office by answering questions in a large group," Roberts said.

Not only do the orientation sessions help students gain the knowledge they need for adjustment, but they eliminate questions in a large-group setting, which saves faculty time from repeating the same answers to several students.

The engineering orientation is required for all new students and consists of three sessions. The third session is Tuesday night.

The arts and sciences trial lasted only one evening, but a more developed program is in the planning stages.

Targeting specific courses and developing study groups is phase two of the student-orientation programs.

Feyerharm and Roberts have worked together to implement this stage in both college orientations.

Two mathematics courses, College Algebra and Calculus I, will get first attention.

Feyerharm said within three or four weeks the session about mathematics courses will be in one or two of the residence-hall dining areas for a trial run.

"We plan to round up students for organizational discussions on how to set up study groups," he said.

Roberts said in the second year of the engineering program, he began discussion with Feyerharm to bring together the academic community and the residence-hall community.

Feyerharm said reaching students where they lived was best for the College of Arts and Sciences. Resident assistants have one-on-one contact with residents and can often tell when students are having trouble.

"RAs should be sensitive to how their students are doing academically," he said.

John Danos, Goodnow Hall director, said resident assistants are constantly gathering class schedules to link stu-

NATION & WORLD

• ISRAEL TO TALK PEACE WITH SYRIA. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu looked to the Clinton administration Monday to re-open peace talks with Syria but ruled out a pullout on the Golan Heights as a precondition for peace with the Arab nation.

The Israeli leader referred to work State Department official Dennis Ross and other American diplomats are resuming the talks that ground to a halt last May.

• MCDOUGAL JAILED FOR KEEPING QUIET. Keeping her word not to cooperate with Whitewater prosecutors, Susan McDougal was led away to jail Monday for contempt of court, denying she was trying to protect President Clinton with her silence.

A federal judge cited her for contempt last week for refusing to answer questions about Clinton before a federal grand jury, and gave her until Monday to change her mind. Mrs. McDougal, 41, could be held for up to 1-1/2 years but could be released immediately if she relents and agrees to testify.

• CHEERLEADER MOM SENTENCED. Wanda Webb Holloway, who offered her diamond earrings in a murder-for-hire plot aimed at getting her daughter on the junior-high cheerleading squad, was sentenced to 10 years in prison Monday.

Holloway, portrayed as a vindictive stage mother at her 1991 trial and two subsequent TV movies, pleaded no contest to murder solicitation and was sentenced by District Judge George Godwin.

• CIVIL WAR TO END IN GUATEMALA. Government leaders and leftist guerrillas will soon sign an agreement on Guatemala's military, the last major issue in talks to end their three-decade civil war.

President Alvaro Arzu did not disclose details of the expected accord, which he said will be signed Sept. 19 in Mexico City. The rebel Guatemalan National Revolutionary Unity had no immediate comment.

• EARTHQUAKE IN SOUTHERN JAPAN. An earthquake shook parts of southwestern Japan today, slightly injuring a woman and cracking roads near Japan's space launching site. The National Space Development Agency was checking whether there was any damage to the launching facilities, where a rocket was scheduled to be sent up next week.

A falling picture frame injured the hands of a 45-year-old woman, said Eiji Sueno of the police station on Tanegashima Island, about 600 miles southwest of Tokyo. Sueno said a road near the Tanegashima launching site was among those cracked by the quake, which officials said had a preliminary magnitude of 5.7.

• NFL'S OLDEST MEMBER DIES. Arda Bowser, the last surviving member of the NFL's first championship team and the league's oldest ex-player, died Saturday. He was 97. Bowser played with the Canton Bulldogs' 1922 championship team. A punter, placekicker, linebacker and fullback, Bowser also was the first NFL player to use kicking tees. In 1922, Bowser made $250 a game.

• HANSPARD, MINTER EARN BIG 12 WEEKLY HONORS. Texas Tech running back Byron Hanspard and Nebraska rover Mike Minter have been named the Big 12 Conference players of the week.

• HEART ATTACK SHOULDN'T STOP ATHLETES, JUDGE SAYS. A federal judge on Monday ruled Northwestern must give 6-foot-5 guard Nick Knapp a chance to play college basketball, even though his heart once stopped during a pickup game. U.S. District Judge James Zagel said Knapp's risk of injury or death related to the cardiac arrest he suffered in Peoria two years ago wasn't great enough to warrant barring him from playing.

FACULTY CHANGES

Stanley Clark, head of the Department of Biological and Agricultural Engineering at K-State, will retire after 30 years of service to the College of Engineering. Clark's career highlight was research of alternative fuel development prompted by the 1973 energy crisis. This included researching the successful use of hydrogen and soybean esters as fuel.

Loren Alexander, professor emeritus of German language and literature, and second-language acquisition at K-State, will receive the Certificate of Merit from the American Association of Teachers of German and the Goethe House New York at an awards luncheon Nov. 22 in Philadelphia. He is one of 10 recipients of the 1996 award for outstanding achievement in furthering the teaching of German.

Parents shrug teen drug use

Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two-thirds of baby-boomer parents who experimented with marijuana as teen-agers expect their own children will do the same, and many say parents have too little influence to stop them, according to a survey released Monday.

The findings, from the first national survey simultaneously asking parents and teen-agers about their attitudes toward drugs, come just weeks after the government announced a doubling of teen drug use.

"That the baby boomers appear to be so ambivalent and so resigned to drug use by kids is very disturbing," said Joseph Califano of Columbia University's Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse, which sponsored the survey.

"They should be mad as hell. Instead they're saying there's nothing we can do about it."

But some parents didn't think the poll painted them so badly.

"It's not so much that people are resigned. I think they're realistic," said Barbara Barrett of Rockville, Md., who has a 16-year-old daughter.

"Drugs are everywhere, and that's hard."

The government reported last month that drug use among 12- to 17-year-olds rose from 5.3 percent of those surveyed in 1992 to 10.9 percent last year.

The new survey questioned 1,200 teens and 1,166 parents of teens, including 819 whose children also were polled.

Almost half of the parents surveyed — 49 percent — had tried marijuana in their youth. About 46 percent knew someone who uses illegal drugs today, including one-third of parents who have friends who currently use marijuana.

Overall, 46 percent of the parents surveyed said they expect their teen to try illegal drugs.

But when researchers looked only at the parents who had experimented with marijuana, akin to a rite of passage for many baby boomers, the numbers jumped.

About 65 percent of parents who used marijuana regularly as teens believe their own children will use drugs, as do 62 percent who experimented with marijuana in their youth. Among parents who never tried marijuana, only 29 percent believe their children will try drugs.

When asked if it is a crisis for someone under 16 to smoke marijuana, 83 percent of parents who never tried pot themselves said yes, but only 58 percent of parents who smoked marijuana regularly as teens were similarly alarmed.

> • JOSEPH CALIFANO
> COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY CENTER OF ADDICTION AND SUBSTANCE ABUSE

Forty percent of parents said they have little influence over their teen's decision to use drugs, saying peer pressure and society play greater roles.

Studies have shown that public perceptions about drug use do forecast the future, said Dr. Richard Heyman, who chairs the American Academy of Pediatrics' Substance-Abuse Committee.

If parents expect their children to try drugs, there will not be enough negative parental influence to fight it, he said.

Worse is if teens are saying, "Gee, Dad, didn't you use drugs?" said Heyman, who counsels parents not to let their past become the issue.

"The answer to that is 'That's not relevant.' What's relevant is that our kids have to be given a no-use message."

Califano, who was President Carter's health secretary, said parents also might not know that the marijuana of the 1960s and 1970s was not as strong as pot sold today.

As for the teens themselves, 22 percent said they are likely or somewhat likely to use drugs in the future, up from 11 percent in the Columbia University group's 1995 survey.

Teens also said their schools are not drug-free: 69 percent of 17-year-olds said they go to school where students keep, use or sell drugs, as did 28 percent of 12-year-olds.

Yet the teens did rank drug use as the biggest problem facing youth, and 55 percent said using marijuana makes it much more likely for teens to get into trouble.

Publications board taps staff's opinions

Jess C. Louk
staff reporter

The Board of Student Publications voted unanimously Monday to amend its constitution, creating two new voting members.

The new members will be elected from the staffs of the Royal Purple and the Collegian advertising office.

Russell Fortmeyer, senior in architectural engineering, was elected by Student Publications Inc. student employees to fill the board position created by last year's board. Last year's members voted to give only one representative from Student Publications Inc.

Fortmeyer will represent the Collegian. The Royal Purple and the advertising office have not yet decided on their candidates.

"This move gives us a chance to have a say in what goes on," Chris Dean, assistant editor of the Royal Purple, said.

The board will now have three faculty advisers, five students elected by the general student populace and the three Student Publications Inc. representatives. The five delegates elected by the student body are not allowed to work forany of the three student publications.

The change in constitution comes as a direct result of a lack of communication between the Collegian staff and the board last semester

"It would enhance our communications between board, Student Publications and staff," said board chairman Patrick Carney before the vote.

The board also discussed new ways to make the Royal Purple more accessible to students when the new mail-in fee-payment system goes into effect.

Linda Puntney, assistant director of Student Publications Inc. and Royal Purple adviser, suggested contacting the controller's office to have a box added to the new enrollment forms.

Students would then have to check a box stating they did not want the yearbook. If students neglected to check the box, they would be billed $24.95, the cost of the yearbook.

The director of Student Publications Inc., Ron Johnson, delivered a report to the board.

Johnson said the total number of Royal Purples sold at fee payment was down 125 from last year's total, but the fee-payment sales were up $4,483.37 due to the $4.95 increase in cost.

Collegian receives praise for news coverage

The Collegian has won the highest all-American rating from the Associated Collegiate Press' critique service for academic year 1995-96.

Ron Johnson, Collegian news adviser, said teamwork from the staff helped win the award.

The award was given in the following five areas of distinction: coverage and content, writing and editing, photography, art and graphics, layout and design, and leadership.

ACP, a national collegiate press association, together with College Media Advisers, sponsors the nation's largest convention for collegiate media each fall.

The Collegian was praised at the convention for coverage of news that directly affected the student body.

Two students also won national awards from CMA for their work with the Collegian.

Charity Omli, a May 1996 advertising graduate and Collegian advertising designer, won first place in the best promotional advertisement.

Omli is employed by Geo Probe in Salina.

Sarah Lunday, senior in print journalism, received second place in business and economic reporting.

Johnson said the awards Omli and Lunday won are similar to the all-American given to athletes.

Johnson said the Collegian is well balanced because it won national awards in both advertising and news.

"A well-rounded publication speaks highly of communication among the staff," Johnson said.

The editors judging the competition were from USA Today and the Wall Street Journal.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Wefald has been effective leader during first decade

President Jon Wefald has transformed our university into a first-class institution of higher learning.

But the University of Minnesota is considering him as a candidate to be its president.

He has done so much here that we would hate to lose him.

WHY WE CARE

President Jon Wefald's leadership will be sorely missed if he is chosen for and accepts a job at the University of Minnesota.

His tenure during the past decade has witnessed several accomplishments that have improved the quality of education and the general attitude of the students and faculty at K-State.

Wefald's goal 10 years ago was to take K-State up several notches in the Big 8. He has succeeded.

Wefald has beautified the campus with several improvements of old buildings and adding new buildings, including the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and Farrell Library.

Additions like these have truly turned K-State around by making the campus something everyone can be proud of.

At the same time, Wefald can be credited for increasing enrollment at K-State to an all-time high.

Wefald has also sought to employ the best faculty in the country by making faculty salaries a top-notch priority and has worked diligently at increasing salaries for staff members.

The president has also done a great deal to give students a say in the governing of K-State.

Wefald has given more power to students by increasing the duties and responsibilities of the student body president and Student Senate. It was his idea to hand the fee-paymen issue to Senate.

Many awards have been won by the faculty and students at K-State during Wefald's stint as president.

He has achieved this by increasing student participation and improving the quality of the faculty members at K-State.

The president's success is also due to the brilliant team he has acquired during the past decade.

Wefald has surrounded himself with some of the best personnel in their fields.

Together, they have given K-State a reputation as a first-class institution throughout the United States.

Conflict in Iraq

Problems in Middle East will not be easily solved

In the last week, the United States launched a series of missle attacks on Iraq in response to Iraqi attacks on the Kurdish safe haven of Irbil.

Strong bipartisan support of the attack has been given to President Clinton.

The only nay-sayers have been those who believed the attack was a result of a lax Iraqi policy of Clinton's or a result of President Bush's failure to finish the job in 1991.

As a veteran of the Gulf War, I have a hard time pulling up much sympathy for Saddam Hussein.

If he were to be overthrown tomorrow, no small amount of joy would suffuse me.

The situation in Iraq, though, isn't all black and white. Numerous factions and countries are involved in this conflict.

The Kurds themselves are divided into the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, which appears to be loosely allied with Iran, and the Kurdish Democratic Party, which has recently allied with Iraq.

> "The situation in Iraq, though, isn't all black and white. Numerous factions and countries are involved in this conflict."

Other countries involved are the surrounding nations of Iran and Turkey, as well as the United States.

It is no stretch to say all three of these nations have played a significant role in the escalation of the present situation.

First a bit of history. The Kurds, numbering 22 million, are the largest ethnic group on the planet that doesn't have a homeland.

The group is spread out over Iran, Iraq, Syria, Turkey, Armenia and Azerbaijan.

After Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Gulf War, the Kurds rebelled in northern Iraq and were brutally crushed. As a result, more than 2 million Kurds fled across the boarders of Iran and Turkey.

The United States set up a no-fly zone across the 36th parallel to protect the Kurds and stop Iraqi aggression.

The PUK, led by Jalal Talabani, has the support of roughly 70 percent of the Kurdish population, while the KDP, under Massoud Barzani, controls the rest. In the last 20 months, fighting between the two factions has accounted for more than 4,000 deaths.

After the Gulf War, the United States financed the establishment of the Iraqi congress, made up of the two Kurdish factions. Afterward, however, this was allowed to fall by the wayside.

Recently, Barzani wrote a letter to Saddam, addressing him as "Your Excellency," begging that Iraq become involved in the Kurdish dispute, "... to repel the foreign invaders."

Iran, which has always played a role behind the scenes of the Kurdish conflict, has recently become more directly involved by supporting the PUK in addition to making brief incursions into Iraq several weeks ago.

MY

Lach FRANQUEMONT

Many experts believe much of the trouble could have been avoided by the United States taking a harder line stance against this Iranian aggression.

Turkey plays at least as meaningful a role in recent conflicts.

It is important to note that from the same air force base the United States uses in Turkey to enforce the no-fly zone, Turkey has launched numerous attacks on its own Kurdish population.

One of the breaches in Kurdish unity in Iraq was caused by illicit oil sales the KDP was making to Turkey.

Iraq was one of Turkey's significant trading partners before the war, and the sanctions have cost the Turks an estimated $23.7 billion.

This has led to more and more unrest in Turkey. Recently, a new government was issued into power, led by Prime Minister Necmettin Erbakan of the Conservative Islamic Party.

Look for U.S. relations with Turkey to continue to deteriorate.

Finally, we come to the United States' often under-reported role in the recent hostilities.

Although the United States has made several attempts to mediate the disputes between the Kurds, they have been sporadic and underfunded.

The Clinton administration had planned a monitoring force of neutral Kurds to mediate the disputes but never followed through on its promises.

In addition, it has given the impression it was moving away from Kurd support in favor Jordanian-backed Iraqi defectors.

This, in effect, removed an invisible security blanket from the Kurds.

What I have given is a thumbnail sketch of the situation that doesn't even remotely begin to explain all the intricacies and complexities involved.

This is not merely an off-shoot of the Gulf War but a complex situation with many players involved.

If Clinton is to blame, it is for his lack of foresight in the policies dealing with the Kurds and not for his failure to contain Saddam.

Finally, this situation should be watched closely, and the United States should be careful not to tip the balance of power in the region.

If the cards are played badly, a major conflict in the Middle East will result.

Honor code should focus on student learning; teachers, classes should, too

MY

Keely SCHIELDS

If you've made it this far into today's paper, you've probably read something in the past week about a proposed honor code that would replace the current policy on academic honesty.

It sounds like a step in the right direction — particularly in its emphasis on student responsibility. After all, who ultimately decides whether to cheat, if not the individual student?

When students dishonor themselves by choosing to cheat, they ought to suffer a stiff and standard set of consequences, previously known to them, as the proposed honor code recommends.

Although this sort of rigid and specific punishment for cheating would be an improvement, we can't expect it to further deter cheating. It isn't as if students right now believe the current policy won't punish them if they are caught cheating. To really reduce cheating at K-State, academic dishonesty has to be attacked before it appears.

My intention here isn't to defend the student who lacks the honor to maintain complete honesty in academics. As I mentioned before, students don't have to cheat if they don't want to. However, I would like to point toward a way in which the system might better promote student responsibility and honesty.

K-State is a large university with a large student body, and it's an unfortunate fact that some classes have to be huge and impersonal. Even so, it's not necessary that so many of these classes be nothing more than big, big jokes.

Too often, colossal introductory courses (incidentally, the same ones in which cheating is widespread) are administered in a way that doesn't encourage learning above regurgitation. Information is systematically thrown at students, and students are measured in terms of how accurately they throw it back into a certain bubble. The most important thing is that students fill in many bubbles so the class is tacked onto their transcripts.

> "When students dishonor themselves by choosing to cheat, they ought to suffer a stiff and standard set of consequences, previously known to them."

Where's the honor in that?

Understanding isn't encouraged in many classes most students have to take. Even if all larger classes aimed for students' understanding, they couldn't really measure it in this way.

If it were up to me to implement any one measure I thought would curb cheating at K-State, I would put an end to bubble-sheet testing.

Besides the fact that students have an easier time cheating on this type of test, it's an insult at the university level. For the most part, it doesn't ask students to understand what is presented to them, nor does it encourage them to take pride in what they're doing. When they don't care about anything more than the grades they get on the test, they're more likely to choose an even easier way of obtaining those grades.

Considering the number of students sitting in some lecture halls, another type of testing might seem like a practical nightmare. But I've been in a large class that tested with long-answer essay questions, and it worked. And we understood.

And there was some sense of honor in the way that class was taught.

Once again, the newly proposed policy is promising in its focus on students. To make the policy even more effective, it would be nice if all classes were taught in a way that supported that focus.

Political actions

Editor,

I must commend Jeremy Stephens on his column, "Apathy will get you nowhere." It tackles the issue of apathy, which is becoming too apparent. However, we should look beyond the text of an acceptance speech.

Ironically, after claiming Bob Dole is the lesser of all evils, Stephens goes on to say he would "vote for a mean person who would lower taxes ... rather than a nice person who would raise taxes and enlarge the class of people dependent on the government."

I'm assuming he is talking about the across-the-board 15-percent tax cut Dole proposes. We must look at who would benefit the most from this when today the wealthiest 1 percent own as much as the bottom 95 percent. Shouldn't we fix these inequalities with tax cuts for middle- and lower-class working families that President Clinton has passed and supports before we worry about that set tax cut for all?

This class of dependents Stephens refers to are those like us who depend on student loans and other things that provided opportunity where it otherwise would not be possible. Without this assistance, only an elite few would succeed, and the inequalities would become even greater. We need to raise people up, not shut them out.

On an issue of ethnicity and discrimination, we must look beyond Dole's speech. Look at the Republican delegation, where two to one of the delegates were white males. Where were the women and minorities?

The Democratic delegation was different. It was a cross-section of America, the melting pot. Every group from homosexuals to Samoans was represented on the convention floor. If a party is going to get together and discuss the issues, isn't it helpful to include those whom the issues pertain to instead of philosophizing about what they think "these people" are going through in the battles they face?

There are many issues in this election that will affect you, so please do get involved and vote as Stephens suggests. However, I challenge you to vote for the nice people out there who are concerned and care about the issues that will secure the future for all Americans.

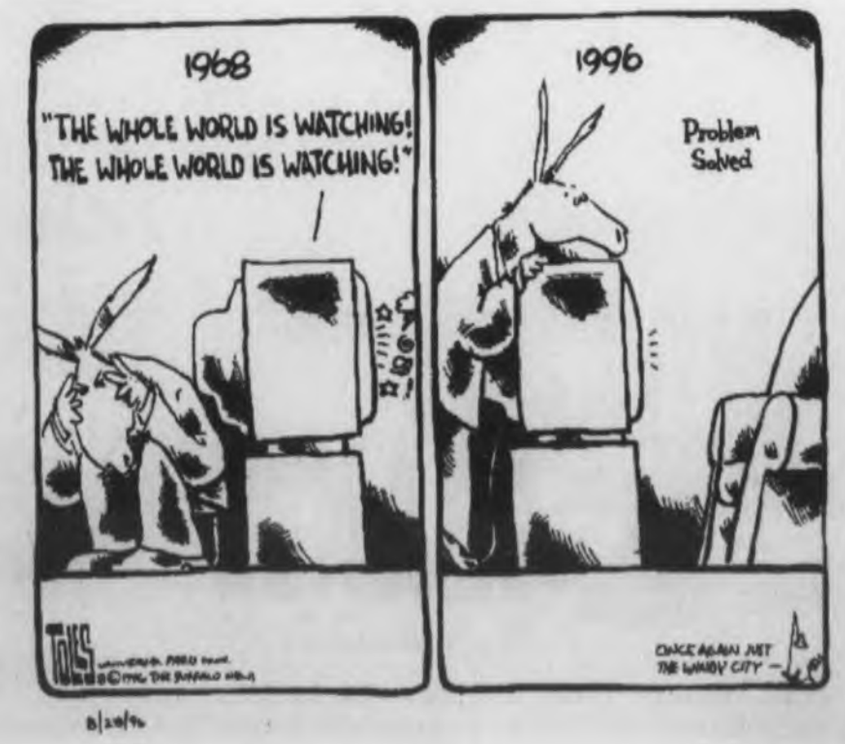
A doctor in the library?



Editor,

Justin Stahlman has created a beautiful graphic illustration of the new library. We appreciate your devoting a page of the Collegian to it. Unfortunately, it appears we are going into the medical business when one looks at the first floor. The DOC in Justin's notes was meant to be the abbreviation for documents, not doctor. Our Government Documents unit is on the first floor of the library.

We appreciate the publicity, and I am sure the graphic will help students get oriented to this new building.

Future student IDs might diversify with debit, phone-card options

SPEED

▶ The K-State ID card could become more than just another picture ID if proposed plans are passed. Look forward to uses such as a debit card or a phone card to be added to the ID card.

Abbi Hake
staff writer

Services such as a debit card and a phone card could all be a part of a single K-State ID card in the future.

Jack Thoman, assistant business director of the K-State Student Union, said he hopes a new ID card will be available within the next year.

The new card will feature a digitized photo, much like Kansas driver's licenses, and probably look different from K-State's current ID card.

It won't just be a new design, though. The new card will use a new world of technological capabilities that have not been available with the current card.

"Today's campus cards can do everything in your wallet," said Bill Norwood, the executive director of the Card Application Technology Center in Tallahassee, Fla.

Norwood has been hired by K-State as a consultant to help bring the new card into existence.

Norwood said some of the capabilities could include a campus account, debit card, meal card, building access and phone card.

With the new card, students will have a campus account, much like the curren. Wildcat Card Account, where they can deposit money into an account and use it at designated locations on campus.

The new card will extend the current capabilities, though, by making it possible for students to take the card off campus and use it at local merchants, Norwood said.

The card will also have the potential to be used as a debit card. When the University establishes the card, it will collaborate with a bank that will offer its services through the new student ID.

This will make it possible for students with an active bank account to approach any automatic teller machine with their IDs and withdraw money from their accounts.

Phone-card usage will also be available with any student ID. The card will be connected to a phone company that can be accessed simply by making a call on the card. The student will then be billed.

Jack Sills, senior associate director of the Union, said he hopes to have the card available by next semester.

With the implementation of a new card comes the problem of having to issue the new cards to the entire student body.

Norwood said it isn't as time-consuming as a student might think.

"Your typical time there is three minutes," said Norwood about the average time it takes to take a get information and take the picture for the new ID. The IDs would be mailed to students.

Thoman said K-State has been looking into a new card for two years. Since then, K-State has examined several universities that already have these cards.

Florida State University is among the leaders in the establishment of a new card.

"We were very much impressed with what we saw at Florida State," Sills said.

One function of the Florida State card has saved many students time in the financial-aid system by almost eliminating standing in line to receive financial-aid payments.

This method, which is also a possibility for K-State, means students can receive their financial aid or scholarship monies through the card's account and access the money at ATM locations.

"It cleans up the lines and gets rid of all the old processes," Norwood said.

Hussein's allies capture stronghold

Associated Press

DOKAN, Iraq — Kurdish allies of Saddam Hussein captured the last stronghold of their rebel rivals Monday, giving the Iraqi leader control over much of northern Iraq for the first time since the Persian Gulf War.

With Iraqi troops trailing close behind, the Kurdistan Democratic Party claimed control of the city of Sulaymaniyah after the crumbling forces of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan abandoned their posts, U.N. workers in the city said.

About 50,000 of Sulaymaniyah's 400,000 people fled in advance of the offensive, leaving the city quiet after its fall, Clarry said.

The United States, which launched missile strikes against southern Iraq last week, made clear it has no plans to take sides in the fighting between the Kurdish factions, who have frequently shifted alliances in the course of their conflict.

The missile strikes appeared to discourage Saddam's forces from taking a direct role in the fighting, but it has not slowed the Saddam-allied KDP.

KDP fighters said they entered Sulaymaniyah Monday evening after residents rebelled to force out a rival, Iranian-backed Kurdish faction and its leader, Jalal Talabani.

The city was the last stronghold left in the hands of the PUK forces after it lost Irbil, the area's de facto capital, on Aug. 31 in a KDP offensive backed by the Iraqi army.

The capture of Sulaymaniyah means Saddam effectively wields control over much of northern Iraq for the first time since the U.S.-led forces established a Kurdish safe haven after the 1991 Gulf War.

The town of Dokan fell to the KDP earlier in the day, giving the Kurdish group control of a dam that supplies water and power to the region.

A long convoy of KDP fighters entered Dokan with strips of yellow ribbon — the faction's color — tied to their guns.

Some Dokan residents offered water to KDP fighters and waved yellow flags, yelling "Piroz be!" — "Congratulations" in Kurdish.

As his fighters claimed the town, KDP leader Massoud Barzani stood on a hill just outside, saluting his men as they entered.

"This is the end of the collaborator," he said, referring to PUK leader Talabani's alliance with Iran.

The PUK had put up stiff resistance until Monday, but appeared unable to hold back the onslaught.

Iraqi forces were advancing across the region behind the front-line KDP

However, things were not always smooth for Brownback as student body president. The Feb. 29, 1979, issue of the Collegian reported his coming under scrutiny for basketball-ticket sales.

In fall 1978, a variety of changes were announced. First, there was to be no camping out until five days before tickets were to go on sale. Second, group tickets could only be for an organized group of 10 students. Third, there could be no camping out or standing in lines for tickets until 7:30 a.m. on the morning of ticket sales.

Two days after the new policy was announced, on the morning camp-out was allowed to begin, Brownback announced in the Collegian that group reserved tickets would be sold by a lottery system.

Students were outraged by the original changes and further aggravated by the confusion.

According to the Oct. 31, 1978, issue of the Collegian, Deloss Dodds, athletic director at the time, said the lottery system was implemented for safety reasons.

Students saw it differently. The lottery system took away the tradition of the campout. It also took away the reward for being a loyal fan and a hardy camper by giving everyone an equal opportunity for group reserved tickets.

Campout used to start a couple weeks before ticket sales, Greg Musil, SGA vice chair during Brownback's presidency, said.

"In the old days, you just heard someone was camping out for tickets, so you'd start camping," he said.

Students were missing lots of class, and it was crazy for two weeks, Musil said.

In response to student criticism, SGA set up a special committee to hear student complaints, conduct a survey and submit a proposal to SGA and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

One year later, a policy was adopted that was widely accepted.

The controversy about basketball tickets brought the need for a new field house to the forefront of everyone's mind, Bill Manning, former student senator, said.

As a result, a referendum raising student activity fees to help fund a new arena won by a landslide, Manning said.

During the February 1979 student body elections, more than 5,600 students voted.

"It was the largest, the highest voter turnout in history at the time," Manning said.

Earlier that month, SGA had revised the amount of votes needed to pass a referendum, according to the Feb. 14, 1979, issue of the Collegian. If less than one-third of the student body voted, a referendum would need two-thirds of those votes to pass. If more than one-third of the student body voted, the referendum would pass with a simple majority.

"You can't defeat a referendum by staying home and not voting," Brownback said in the article.

Brownback graduated later that year but has remained active at K-State.

He taught agricultural law from 1983 to 1986 while working as an attorney in Manhattan. He also has been a financial contributor to the University, a regular at sporting events and a frequent speaker for various groups on campus.

Brownback is serving his first term as Kansas' second district representative, which represents Manhattan.

"I love K-State. It holds a deep place in my heart," Brownback said.

Baseball team taking applications

BAT

▶ The K-State baseball office will be accepting applications through Sept. 19 in Bramlage Coliseum. Interviews will be Sept. 23 - 24. For further information, contact the baseball office at 532-5723.

▪ The K-State baseball program is beginning a support group, and interested students are asked to volunteer.

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Coming soon to a baseball diamond near you — the Bat Cats.

In an attempt to boost fan attendance at baseball games, K-State coach Mike Clark is asking students interested in helping the baseball team at home games to apply to be a Bat Cat.

"This is strictly a support group for the program," Clark said.

Twenty men and women will be selected for the program each year.

The Bat Cats will be in charge of retrieving foul balls, running the scoreboard, selling programs, gathering bats and ushering box seats. They will also be involved in marketing and promotions.

Although being a Bat Cat is strictly a volunteer position, each member will receive a K-State baseball T-shirt, sweatshirt and shorts.

Although Clark attempted to begin a program like this when he first arrived at K-State in 1986, the idea didn't go far. But with student interest in recent years, Clark said he was willing to try again.

"In the past couple of years, there have been people who have wanted to help out," he said. "We need all of the people we can get."

The main proponent of the program is Tonia West, junior in accounting. A longtime Wichita State University baseball fan, West is familiar with Wichita State's Golden Girls.

After spending last spring break following the Shockers to a tournament in California with her family, West said she started wondering why K-State could not have a program similar to the Golden Girls.

"I began asking questions," West said. "One of the players was a boyfriend of a girl who started the same program at KU."

West contacted the player's girlfriend to find out how to begin a program like KU's and Wichita State's at K-State.

After working out by-laws and other administrative formalities, West said she thinks the Bat Cat program could be a successful one.

"I'm excited about it," West said. "It took KU three years to get to funding for it, and I think we can do the same thing here."

RUNNING BACK Marlon Charles is forced out of bounds by Indiana State's Dre' Knox. A face-mask penalty followed the play.

Charles' performance doesn't make him No. 1, yet

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

After Saturday night's game, Marlon Charles said he was tired.

Who could blame him?

Charles rushed for a career-high 195 yards on 33 carries and scored three touchdowns in the 59-3 victory over Indiana State.

"I wasn't expecting to play that much and get that many carries, but I'll take them," Charles said.

Charles' 195 yards is the fourth-best single-game rushing total in K-State history. His 33 carries were just eight shy of the school record, while his three touchdowns were just one short of the school record.

All this from a running back who watched running mate Mike Lawrence touch the ball for the first seven plays. But on the eighth play, Lawrence drew a personal-foul penalty.

Two plays later, Charles started his campaign with a 7-yard gain.

"Marlon held onto the ball and ran well," Coach Bill Snyder said. "I was pleased for the most part with his performance."

Charles

Lawrence later entered the game and fumbled, resulting in a turnover.

On the next series for K-State, Charles was sent back in to rush the ball, sparking a ground attack that rebounded from a dismal minus 12 yards against Texas Tech.

The Cats' offensive line provided enough holes for the rushing attack to accumulate 268 yards.

"The line was blocking great all day," Charles said. "I couldn't have done it without them."

But Charles wasn't the only Wildcat back who provided a surprising spark.

Fullback Brian Goolsby had three rushes for 26 yards, including a 15-yard touchdown run, the first of his college career. The touchdown, with 9:04 left in the first quarter, gave K-State a 7-0 lead.

"The first touchdown is always a happy feeling," Goolsby said. "I just try to get out there and make some things happen, whether it is with good blocks or a touchdown."

Was Charles' performance good enough to elevate him into the starting lineup against Cincinnati?

"No," Charles said. "I have to be consistent every week. Mike (Lawrence) is a great back. They just wanted to give me some experience."

Snyder agreed.

"We will have to make an honest assessment on that based on a lot of things," Snyder said.

Charles said he received advice from injured running back Eric Hickson during halftime.

"Eric talked to me at halftime and told me to slow it down on the draw play," Charles said. "I went in the second half and started to slow it down. I noticed the holes started opening up for me."

Although Charles' performance was a surprise to many, Snyder said he had seen this before out of Charles.

"It wasn't a surprise to me," Snyder said. "I watched him run last year. He ran very well. He picked up where he left off."

Despite Snyder's praise, Charles said he is only in the process of moving where he wants to go.

"I'm happy with my performance, but it is just one game," Charles said. "But it seems to be a step in the right direction."

▶ BASKETBALL

Individual practices allow players to focus on basics

DAN LAWERENZ
sports writer

The glare of the lights, the roar of the crowd — it's basketball season.

It might seem a little premature to start talking hoops in September, but try telling that to K-State's basketball players.

NCAA rules allow coaches to begin individual practices, with no more than three players at a time, in the early fall. For women's basketball coach Debbie Patterson and her players, it began at 6:15 a.m. Wednesday.

"We use this as an opportunity to develop fundamentals among our players," Patterson said.

Although it might seem that players at Division I schools already know the fundamentals, men's basketball coach Tom Asbury said little things, such as shooting, tend to get overlooked in a player's development.

"Sometimes when you get to this level, you don't get a chance to work on the mechanics of a guy's shot," he said. "Individuals are a place you can address those kinds of things so you don't have to spend time on them in practice."

For Patterson, who inherited a team known for its defensive tenacity and offensive inconsistency, the emphasis is on building a level of comfort with the ball.

"We need to become a better ball-handling team," she said. "We need to develop offensive skills and understand and be comfortable in an offensive tempo.

"What you see right now is the extent to which we are comfortable with the ball, and that is the limit to which we can score points."

So the players dribble the ball while doing sit-ups, go between the legs with one hand and shoot endless jump shots under the watchful eye of an assistant coach.

Players are usually brought in with others who play the same position, Asbury said, but won't get the chance to work out with the entire team until practice begins in October.

"That way you really get an opportunity to work on personal weaknesses and hammer out those concerns before practice starts," Asbury said.

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

KJERSTEN LARSON celebrates after a teammate makes a free throw during the women's team's game against the University of Kansas last season. Larson, a returning senior point guard, is only one of the Wildcats who are working in individual practices for the next couple of weeks. K-State's women's basketball season is scheduled to begin Nov. 17 against an undetermined foreign exhibition team. The men's basketball team is scheduled to open its season Nov. 9 against the NBC Thunder Camps.

Need a daily dose of sports wisdom? Genius columnist explains it all

Now what did Todd tell you last week?

Oh, you don't remember? Well, let me see if I can't freshen your memory. I know Brian Kavanagh remembers.

"Sooner or later, Kavanagh will remember that receivers prefer balls thrown in the hands. Or somewhere in the vicinity."

OK, call me a genius. Four days after that appeared, Kavanagh went 19-for-22 for 232 yards and three touchdowns. All of that in just more than two quarters of play.

Not proof enough of my genius? Oh, I've only just begun.

"Sooner or later, the offensive line will remember when it comes to run-blocking, it is usually a good thing to block that guy right in front of you. Running backs like that."

MY

Todd STEWART

Thank you, Kendyl Jacox, Jason Johnson and crew. Your running back Marlon Charles put up the fourth-best rushing game ever by a K-State back, 195 yards on 33 carries.

I tried to tell all you Wildcat faithful not to fret, but still you questioned the running game.

And now example three. Then I'll let you start thinking of a better word than genius. Find something that encompasses my true brilliance.

"The defensive line will someday realize that it is OK to tackle that guy who just ran by. He won't hurt you."

Three of the front four for K-State were in on a sack, and, combined with the second- and third-stringers behind them, Indiana State managed only 68 yards on the ground. They did this against primarily first-string players.

> "Don't start petitioning for Coach Bill Snyder to use true-freshman quarterback Jonathan Beasley instead of Kavanagh."

Prophet? That's your suggestion?

Well, I wouldn't place that title on myself, but if you insist .... OK, prophet it is. You are way too kind.

What I am trying to tell you is, don't doubt the Cats.

And don't doubt Kavanagh, the running game or the defense.

Don't start petitioning for Coach Bill Snyder to use true-freshman quarterback Jonathan Beasley instead of Kavanagh.

Beasley looked great against Indiana State on Saturday. His phenomenal 57-yard touchdown pass to wide receiver Troy Hackney gave Cat fans a glimpse into his bright future.

But the future is next year, not next week.

Beasley even admitted he's still learning the offense and that he probably only has a grasp of about one-fourth of it right now. Kavanagh, however, has been in the Snyder system for five years and has a better grasp of it than any quarterback has in the Snyder era.

Kavanagh is the man in 1996. The Jonathan Beasley Show will make its debut next August.

> "I tried to tell all you Wildcat faithful not to fret, but still you questioned the running game."

As for the running game, Charles' performance on Saturday made Cat fans forget all about the two broken bones in Eric Hickson's left leg.

Current starter Mike Lawrence has been unimpressive in two games, so Charles' outburst provided the Cats with just the shot of adrenaline they needed.

So now the answer to the question on everyone's mind: Who do you start at tailback?

Charles' 195 yards, even if they were against I-AA Indiana State, was too impressive to overlook. Charles gets my vote for Saturday.

Defensively, the front four looked 10 times better Saturday and finally showed the potential they have. Nyle Wiren has been all-world the first two weeks, and look for him to bring the defensive line up a notch every week.

Trust me, everything is going to be all right. Being exposed to a prophet's wisdom is not something people get every day. Most never get one day in a lifetime.

You, my friends, are lucky. You'll get your dose every Tuesday.

'Spitfire': causes stir

BETH HUSTED
staff reporter

"The Spitfire Grill" isn't your usual "Fried Green Tomatoes"-esque movie. In other words, it's not just a chick flick.

This movie isn't full of any famous three-time Oscar winners or even semi-recognizable names. But what this movie does have is some incredible performances by some outstanding newcomers and some not-so-familiar-faces.

Percy, the main character, has recently been released from a Maine prison and tries to find solace in the backwoods community of Gilead, Maine. But what she finds is the typical response to a stranger in a small town.

The stir she causes is incredible. She breathes life back into a town that is quickly losing its balance.

Percy puts the fire in a mousy housewife, takes the bitterness out of an old bag, humbles a fat-headed hometown moron and brings the lost soul of a Vietnam veteran home.

Percy is sincere, blunt and honest — almost to a fault. She allies herself to an old woman named Hannah. Hannah has a secret. It's this secret that will eventually bring about the demise of one character and the homecoming of another.

Percy also starts a stir in the town by helping Hannah try to sell the grill, a restaurant Hannah owns. Percy tells Hannah to start an essay contest. Each contestant must submit an essay on why they want the grill and $100. By the time the contest nears its end, they have raised more than $200,000.

One of the most memorable scenes is in the first 10 minutes. Percy has been fighting the label of being the newest tidbit of gossip.

In the middle of the cafe, after listening to the quiet whispers of the people, she screams out to the owner, "Hannah, did I forget to mention that I was just released from a Maine correctional facility? And that I only went to solitary three times."

This movie seems to be the right mixture of human experience. What you discover about "The Spitfire Grill" is that Gilead is the town for lost souls.

It also wasn't hard to see that this was going to be a tear-jerker. And not just for women either. There were grown men sobbing in the theater before the conclusion.

So guys, if you're looking for the movie that might cause that one girl to at last rest her head on your shoulder, this could be the one.

On a five-star rating system, this is a definite 4-1/2.

Dear Cassie

by Cassandra Duveaux

Shy seniors seek advice from Cassandra

Dear Cassandra,

Several of my acquaintances and myself find ourselves confronted with an extremely disheartening dilemma.

Being seniors, we feel we have missed out on an integral college ritual. The ritual to which we refer would be the acquisition of carnal knowledge upon the women of the K-State campus.

However, don't take us for callow savages. Sex isn't the only thing to which we aspire. As pathetic as it may seem, not a single one of us has even had the pleasure of a date with any of the many wonderful women of K-State.

Note, each one of us is extremely shy, sensitive and not necessarily open to rejection; hence the ensuing void of companionship.

Advice would be extremely appreciated, yet ridicule aggressively avenged.

Mistreated in Manhattan

Dear Mistreated:

First off, boys, Cassie does not respond to threats. If I deem your corny letter worthy of my rapier wit, no threat of vengeance will deter me.

So you're shy, sensitive guys who just want some companionship. You fear rejection while seeking to fill your dance card for the horizontal lambada.

Get real, fellas. If you're looking for sex, yet afraid of rejection, get used to Right Hand Rosie and her Five Fondling Friends because they're the only company you'll have for some time.

If you really are sensitive guys looking for a nice woman, put the sex on the back burner. The firmest ass in the shortest skirt shouldn't be your goal. Talk with the women in your classes, from your hometown, in clubs you're a member of, whatever. Find someone you have something in common with.

True love, the type caring, sensitive people can share, is based on mutual respect, and the beauty we find within.

Your problem is not that you're too shy to get a date. You're too macho to be taken seriously by the type of woman you're supposedly interested in.

Wait for the right woman to come along, then treat her like she's a human being. We women like that, you know.

And ladies, help me out here. If these guys sound like your type, let me know, and I'll see if I can't set you up. If these guys sound like complete cretins, let me know, and I'll set them straight.

Fees bring credit options

SPEED READ

- Departments create zero credit option to alleviate burden created by new linear fees. Faculty examines ways to prevent elective enrollment declines.

HEATHER HOLLINGSWORTH
staff writer

Editor's note: This is the second in a series of five articles.

Linear tuition has prompted students to take a fresh look at the way they select classes.

Electives are no longer freebies, because students are forced to pay an hourly rate instead of a flat fee.

This has in turn caused concern among groups offering classes not required for graduation. These groups include the music, theater and dance departments and Student Senate.

Two years ago student senators received two hours of credit, and interns received one hour of credit for Senate participation.

In fall 1995 the requirements changed. Senators who enrolled in Student Leadership in Governance received two hours of credit for the class, which met twice weekly. About 10 people were enrolled in the class in spring 1996, Aubrey Abbott, Student Senate chair, said.

Although a no-credit option was available in fall 1996, the class was dropped due to lack of enrollment, Abbott said.

"The whole reason for the class was to give senators credit for their participation," she said. "With linear tuition, senators end up paying for the credit in addition to all the hours they spend in government each week."

Abbott did not think the change would radically affect Senate participation.

"It was never a big issue," Abbott said. "People realized if I'm going to be involved in Senate, I'm going to be on my own time."

Students taking classes in the music department also experienced policy changes. In the past, musicians received one hour of credit for participation in music ensembles.

"For a student who pays full fees after seven hours, they never even thought that they were paying for band," Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president, said. "Now that they have to pay for each credit hour, they might say, 'Gee, I don't want to do that.'"

This concern was confounded by the fact that a large percentage of individuals participating in ensembles are non-music majors, Jack Flouer, head of the music department, said.

To combat this problem, the music department considered allowing students to participate in ensembles for no credit, Flouer said.

But this would cause problems in the way the University recognized faculty workloads.

"Faculty must show a load to indicate they are earning their way," Flouer said. "They must show they are generating credit hours."

> "I think a lot of people enrolled last spring and didn't realize what was going on."
> • JACK FLOUER
> HEAD OF THE MUSIC DEPARTMENT

Faculty also worried they would have less control, Flouer said.

"We can't have an ensemble of pure volunteers," Flouer said. "Then people would come when they want to. There would be no way of controlling rehearsal schedules."

Instead, the University decided to offer a variable-credit option this fall.

The variable-credit option allows music majors to pay for required ensembles. Non-music majors and students participating in extra ensembles can enroll for no credit, Flouer said.

But some students were not completely satisfied with the variable-credit option.

Jennifir McGillis, freshman in music education, said receiving no credit for participation in music ensembles was a disadvantage.

McGillis is participating in an ensemble that meets four hours each week. In addition to the class time, members must figure in practice time and concert participation.

"You're basically getting nothing for it," she said.

Flouer said he has not noticed any changes in the size of ensembles this semester, but he has not ruled out the possibility of a behavioral change in coming semesters.

"I think a lot of people enrolled last spring and didn't know what was going on," Flouer said. "I think it's just now beginning to register, so next semester there will be a little difference. I am sure some students registered for credit and paid for it that didn't have to."

Another issue McGillis faced was affording classes after the tuition increase.

Music-education majors must take 136-139 hours to graduate from the nine-semester program. Because students are only allowed to take 12 hours when they student-teach, the remaining eight semesters are heavy loads.

"When it was the flat rate, I would have taken more hours to get through it faster," she said, "but being on a budget really limits you."

The music department has considered the issue of reducing hours, but the music-education degree creates special problems.

"With the music-education degree, we are fighting a losing battle. That degree is determined by outside agencies," Flouer said. "We have to meet the requirements of our accrediting association, work with the College of Education, and then we also meet the requirements of the state board of education."

Despite these issues, the department forges ahead.

"We are working on it right now. There are proposals we have been working on that might reduce it, but it is not finalized. We are really trying on this."

Like the music department, the theater department has switched to a system of variable credit.

Rehearsal Techniques has always been offered for between zero and three hours of credit.

"In past students have always taken one hour of credit," Kate Anderson, director of theater, said. "I'm not sure what students are selecting now."

The department is also in the process of changing the course Drama Participation. Currently, it is being offered for one or two hours of credit. In the future, it will be offered for between zero and two hours of credit.

Despite the change, Anderson was not completely satisfied with the solution.

"The sad thing is they can't get credit unless they pay fees," she said. "They contribute to the University, and it takes a great deal of time. I wish there was another alternative."

The dance department is also concerned about the change to linear tuition.

The department has not experienced enrollment changes in their basic-level courses, Luke Kahlich, director of dance, said.

"What we are wondering is how it will affect our upper-level courses," Kahlich said.

Unlike theater and music, the dance department is not offering variable credit for participation in student productions like Winterdance. Instead, students earn one or two hours of credit for enrolling in Performance Production, Kahlich said.

The dance department refrained from offering the variable credit option, because the department is completing large curriculum changes for next year, Kahlich said.

Hurricane threatens Puerto Rico, tourists

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PONCE, Puerto Rico — Islanders boarded up windows and lined up to buy water, then rushed to the beaches Monday to watch the sea, churned by the outer edge of a strengthening Hurricane Hortense.

The National Weather Service hurriedly issued a hurricane warning for Puerto Rico late Monday morning and authorities posted a hurricane watch for the Dominican Republic's south coast.

Hundreds of tourist yachts, sailboats, house boats and government vessels sought shelter in mangrove swamps in bays of southwestern Puerto Rico.

From 100 miles off St. Croix in the U.S. Virgin Islands, waves the height of a house crashed over the 15-foot pier where cruise ships anchor at Frederiksted. Winds howled and gusted near 70 mph, driving sheets of rain that covered roads with 4 feet of water and flooded homes.

Forecasters called Hortense, the eighth storm and third hurricane of the Atlantic season, volatile and dangerous. It comes on the heels of Hurricane Fran, which skirted the Caribbean before slamming into the eastern United States late last week, killing more than two dozen people.

Forecasters said there was a 6 percent chance the coast of Florida could feel the effects of Hurricane Hortense by Thursday morning.

"These storms are crazy. I pray it doesn't veer toward us," Jose Escobar said, perched on a ladder to board up the window of the store where he works in Ponce, a southern Puerto Rican city renowned for its Spanish colonial architecture.

Escobar hurried to finish work so he could go home to wait out the storm with his wife and five children.

At 8 p.m. EDT Monday, the center of Hortense was about 70 miles south-southeast of Ponce, the National Hurricane Center near Miami said.

Hortense was moving to the northwest at 7 mph and was expected to gain strength. Hurricane-force winds would spread across the south coast of Puerto Rico overnight as the storm neared Puerto Rico, forecasters said.

Hortense grew to hurricane strength Monday and enlarged to a 470-mile-wide mass, with sustained winds near 80 mph in the center and weaker tropical storm-force winds toward the edge.

Hortense also changed direction, stalling south of St. Croix, and then drifting in a northwest direction that would bring hurricane-strength winds dangerously close to Puerto Rico, the hurricane center said.

At the Tropical Si liquor store in Ponce, people stood in long lines to buy water. Rafael Martinez, 42, waited nearly half an hour.

"This is the last thing I have to do. What will be, will be," he said.

Shelves of rum went untouched because Gov. Pedro Rosello on Sunday banned liquor sales during the passage of the storm. Police said they cited 18 storekeepers for illegally selling alcohol.

Couples with children in tow drove to the beach at the southernmost tip of the city to watch in awe and trepidation as the gusting winds whipped up waves nearly 4 feet high. Surfers gloried in the challenge.

Children on bikes raced from from point to point to watch the waves, and cruising police patrols stopped to check that no one needed help.

Roberts, Kassebaum collaborate to ensure preservation of Z-Bar

Erica Duncan
staff reporter

The Z-Bar/Spring Hill Ranch, a 10,894-acre tallgrass prairie in Chase County, will continue to be managed by the National Park Trust until protective legislation is enacted.

Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, Republican presidential nominee Bob Dole and Reps. Pat Roberts and Jan Meyers are working together to pass the legislation proposing the prairie be added to the National Park system.

A bill that included the park was introduced to Congress in April 1995, but the 104th Congress has been reluctant to expand the park system.

Following Monday's Landon Lecture, Kassebaum said Roberts had been helpful in the legislative progress.

"Pat Roberts has been very helpful in the House, and that's probably where we're going to have to make sure that it can come through," she said.

She said the Z-Bar legislation was complicated, but passage could be expected before the current legislative term concludes.

Kassebaum said she thought the bill would be successful.

The bill would ensure the preserve be created with minimal federal ownership and donate 180 acres to the federal government, which would save taxpayers the expense of land-acquisition for the new park. The rest of the land would still be owned by the National Park Trust.

The donated land would include 19th-century buildings — a mansion, a three-story stone barn, a one-room schoolhouse and others — as well as ample acreage for parking and other facilities.

LECTURE

In a news conference following the lecture, Kassebaum said she had nothing to say about the rumors circulating in the media about a marriage proposal between her and former Sen. Howard Baker of Tennessee.

"The press seems to speculate on that, but you'll be the first to know if and when," Kassebaum said. "There is nothing more than the speculation in the papers."

Kassebaum, who is actively campaigning for Rep. Pat Roberts — running for her vacant seat — and has endorsed Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Manhattan, said she is going to be involved in many campaigns this fall.

"I want to certainly help Bob Dole get elected, and I am speaking around the country for other campaigns as well," Kassebaum said. "Have bag, will travel."

Phelps protests Kassebaum's stance on gay rights

Chad Helin
staff reporter

Activist Fred Phelps and a small group protested U.S. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum's Landon Lecture on Monday, criticizing her stance on gay rights and abortion.

Phelps and about six people sang hymns and displayed anti-gay and pro-life signs outside McCain Auditorium before Kassebaum's speech.

"She has the right to hear this," Phelps said. "Who will tell her if we don't? "I'm afraid she'll go to hell."

Phelps said Kassebaum used her 18 years in the Senate to promote gay rights and abortion.

Only a handful of lecture-goers took the time to stop and say anything to the group. Those who did stop told Phelps to go home.

Phelps said K-State is a friendlier place to visit than many other schools.

"I don't know if this school is more righteous or what," he said.

"But there seems to be a different spirit here."

K-State Police were on hand at the protest to ensure that things didn't get out of hand.

"You have to take the good with the bad. As long as they don't hurt anyone, I have to let them stay," Greg Lenkiewicz, campus police officer, said. "But that doesn't mean I have to agree with what they're saying."

Phelps, pastor of the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, travels with other church members around the country to speak out against abortion and homosexuality. They travel year-round, attending as many as 40 events a week.

fighters but were not playing a role in the fighting, according to accounts.

U.N. guards in Sulaymaniyah said it appeared most of the Patriotic Union leadership had fled, possibly to Iran.

Thousands of refugees from the fighting already have crossed into Iran, and "tens of thousands are on the move," Iran's mission to the United Nations said in a statement.

It asked for international aid for the refugees to prevent a human catastrophe.

In Washington, President Clinton said the conflict won't be resolved until the Kurds stop fighting among themselves.

Asbury talks with Cal

On the Web

In Monday's Collegian, the editorial board suggested K-State students take another look at the basketball program and Asbury's success rate. For full details, take a look in the Collegian archives.

■ Coach to travel to West Coast for interview with California.

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

In a statement issued Tuesday, K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury acknowledged he has agreed to interview for the vacant coaching position at California later this week.

One of the top candidates to replace former Cal coach Todd Bozeman, Asbury said the interview does not reflect his interest in the Bears' program.

"I am very happy at K-State because of the great support given me by Dr. Wefald, Bob Krause, Max Urick and Kansas State University over the past 2-1/2 years," Asbury said.

Asbury

Although he said he's happy at K-State, Asbury explained why he has chosen to interview.

"However, in any profession, it is sometimes healthy to explore other opportunities," he said.

Bozeman resigned Aug. 28 amid allegations of recruiting violations.

Sexual misconduct questions also arose shortly after Bozeman's resignation, although an agreement has been reached with the woman who had accused Bozeman.

Cal is undergoing an NCAA investigation into the recruiting violations. It appears likely the investigation will result in sanctions.

Three top players have also left Cal since the season's end.

Defense coach arrested for DUI

JILL STORY
staff writer

K-State football co-defensive coordinator Mike Stoops was arrested early Sunday morning for DUI and transporting an open container.

Stoops

The arrest occurred in the 2300 block of Anderson Avenue at a sobriety checkpoint, the Riley County Police Department said.

"In cases like this, our procedure is that the matter is handled internally as a personnel matter," Max Urick, K-State athletic director, said.

Urick also said he would not speculate that Stoops' job is in jeopardy.

Coach Bill Snyder said it appeared the incident was not all it seemed to be.

"I have talked with him. There are certainly extenuating circumstances involving the situation," Snyder said.

"We will address the situation when the time comes," he said.

Stoops was not available for comment.

This is Stoops' fifth season with K-State's football program.

Stoops is the coach responsible primarily for the defensive ends. He was an all-America defensive back for Iowa, played briefly for the Chicago Bears, and spent a year in the Arena Football League with the Pittsburgh Gladiators.

Inside

The editorial board wants K-State football co-defensive coordinator Mike Stoops to take responsibility for his actions. To find out why, read the Collegian's editorial.

Safe haven falls to Iraqi control; Kurds flee area

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SULAYMANIYAH, Iraq — Saddam Hussein wasted no time Tuesday in re-asserting control of the north of his country after the collapse of a U.S.-declared safe haven, lifting trade and travel barriers that had stood since the Gulf War.

Saddam's Kurdish allies flaunted their new authority over this northeastern city, parading through the streets and looting the headquarters of their vanquished rivals for trophies — even toilet seats and light bulbs.

Tens of thousands of Kurds fled Sulaymaniyah for the rugged hills of nearby Iran after the Baghdad-backed Kurdistan Democratic Party rolled into the city on Monday night.

U.N. officials estimated up to 300,000 Kurds might have left, but many refugees started returning home Tuesday, by truck and taxi and on foot, reassured by news that Saddam's troops had not entered the city.

Saddam sought to discourage an exodus, declaring a general amnesty for all Kurds and lifting travel and trade restrictions between Iraq and the northern semi-autonomous Kurdish areas imposed at the end of the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The full ramifications of the announcement were not immediately clear. But Saddam and his Kurdish

Sanctions on Iraq concern students

DEBBIE HOLLIS
staff reporter

During the recent Kurd uprising in Iraq, many accounts of U.S. military and intelligence actions have been reported.

But the story goes deeper than that for three K-State graduate students. It hits home.

It's not about politics. It's about humanity, Ahlam Al-Rawi, graduate student in physics, said.

The United Nations has imposed sanctions on Iraq for the past six years. Iraq has been isolated from the outside world as a result.

The conditions of the sanctions seem to change every day, said Imad Khamis, graduate student and researcher in statistics.

"The sanctions are hurting the normal people, those who have to fight for survival," Al-Rawi said.

Al-Rawi said there is no money.

▶ Hurricane Hortense cut a swath through Puerto Rico, killing eight people. K-State students with family and friends in Puerto Rico wonder how their families fared.

NICOLE KIRBY
city/government editor

As Hurricane Hortense ravaged Puerto Rico, several K-State students watched anxiously for news of their hometowns and families.

Eight people died in the storm, causing relatives to worry for their loved ones.

"I was praying that it was no one that I knew. That's selfish. I know that's really selfish, but I didn't want to pick up the phone and find out that it was someone I knew or that my friends knew," said Elsa Diaz-Bautista, graduate student in business, whose family lives in the San Juan area.

> GRADUATE STUDENT IN BUSINESS

Diaz-Bautista's family was unharmed, however, and she said everyone she knew with families in Puerto Rico had learned of their safety.

"There were some damages to where they live, to the property. But there were no injuries," she said.

Martin Laster, junior in computer science, also learned of his parents' safety.

Because the power was out in their home, his parents called from a neighbor's house.

"My parents live in Mayagüez, which is in the mountains. There's a lot of trees down and a lot of rain," Laster said. "The trees knocked down a lot of the power lines."

Arleen Baigés, director of Puerto Rico Baila, watched the Weather Channel intently, even after her parents assured her of the family's safety.

"I see the rainfall. Wow. Eighteen inches. That's a lot. Wow, look at that flooding everywhere," Baigés said, while watching the Weather Channel.

Although Baigés' family lives near Laster's, her neighborhood did not experience much damage.

"I was really amazed when my dad told me that only one tree had fallen on my block," she said. "You know how it was in Manhattan this summer when the storm hit, and there were branches all over campus? That's how I envisioned it down there, how it looked on CNN."

However, the winds and rain were so strong

Hortense kills 8 in Puerto Rico, continues swath through Gulf

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Hurricane Hortense lashed Puerto Rico with punishing winds and torrents of rain Tuesday, killing seven people as it snapped trees and power lines, swelled rivers and collapsed hillsides, sweeping away homes.

Eleven people were spotted floating in their home down the raging Guamani Canal. Maritime police pursued the house in a boat, trying to rescue the occupants.

Police said the death toll could rise once they reach areas cut off by the storm, which passed directly over southwest Puerto Rico before dawn Tuesday.

Later Tuesday, Hortense skirted along the northeastern coast of the Dominican Republic, which hasn't been hit by a hurricane in nearly 20 years.

The entire north coast of the Dominican Republic was under a hurricane warning, as were the Turks and Caicos islands and the southeastern Bahamas.

Tourists were ordered off beaches and evacuated from oceanside resorts. Authorities at eastern Punta Cana airport canceled 14 flights after clocking 90-mph wind gusts about noon.

There was a 10-percent chance of the hurricane-striking West Palm Beach, Fla., the National Hurricane Center in Miami said.

In Puerto Rico, victims included a 2-year-old boy killed in a mudslide in the southwest and two sisters, 8- and 13-year-old respectively, swept away by flood waters in the southeast. The girls' bodies were found under a bridge. Four family members were still missing.

A 75-year-old man was carried away by floods in the east-central part of the island, and a woman was found dead — presumably of a heart attack — inside her car in the west-central farming town of Lares. Two unidentified adults drowned in eastern Humacao.

Hortense cut water and electricity to most of Puerto Rico's 3.6 million people. The water supply could be contaminated by rivers overflowing into reservoirs, said Scott Stripling of the National Weather Service in San Juan.

Hundreds of cars were stranded on highways, which ran like rivers with chest-high water in San Juan, the capital.

Tow truck drivers charged $60 to dive into waters filthy with debris and sewage, hook up stalled vehicles and move them to higher ground.

A U.S. Navy helicopter and swimmer braved winds gusting to 55 mph to rescue 11 crew members aboard the freighter Isabella, swamped off the east-coast town of Humacao.

The scene at Guayama, 30 miles south of San Juan, was one of the worst.

The Guamani Canal, part of an old sugar-cane mill network, burst its banks, washed out the Santo Domingo Bridge on coastal Highway 3, and forced its way through the poor Borinquen neighborhood, carrying away at least 50 homes.

24 HOURS IN REVIEW

NATION WORLD

• CONVICTION IN VAMPIRE CASE. A man was convicted of biting and sexually molesting eight teen-age girls as part of a vampire game. The girls testified that Jon C. Bush taught them a game in which he played the leader of a family of ancient vampires. The girls were told they could become vampires by having sex with him or by letting him mark them by biting them hard, usually just below the breasts. The 27-year-old air-conditioner repairman was found guilty by a judge of charges including crimes against nature, indecent liberties and contributing to the delinquency of a minor. He could get more than 100 years in prison at sentencing Nov. 26.

• COLOMBIAN ELECTION. Colombia's vice president resigned Tuesday and called on President Ernesto Samper to step down as well, saying he lacks credibility. Humberto de la Calle, who many believe is considering a 1998 presidential bid, said Colombia needs fresh leaders who can deal with rising unemployment, coca farmer protests and the worst rebel attacks in decades.

• GREECE ELECTION. In the past, Greece's colorful elections have lacked only one thing: alcohol. Public Order Minister Kostas Beis announced Tuesday that for the first time in modern Greek history, bars and nightclubs will be allowed to serve alcohol during elections Sept. 22. Greek elections are scheduled on Sundays, and the alcohol restriction was meant to ensure that Greeks had a clear head when they stood in front of the ballot box.

CITY STATE

• HANTAVIRUS DEATH. The state has had its first death since 1994 from a rare infection associated with some species of mice. The healthagency confirmed that a southwest Kansas resident died from the Hantavirus infection. It did not release the person's name or hometown, in keeping with a state policy. Hantavirus usually comes from mice droppings, urine or saliva and is usually contracted when a person breathes contaminated air while cleaning up droppings. The health agency said the victim had been cleaning the basement.

• STATE TEST SCORES HIGHER. The state's high-school seniors appeared to do slightly better this year on a national college entrance exam, and Tuesday's report on the numbers quickly became propaganda for public-school advocates. The average score on the American College Testing Program's exam, known as the ACT, was 21.3 on a 36-point scale. Last year's overall score was 21.2, and the overall score has risen slightly since 1993. Kansas students also appeared to score better than students in other states. The national average was 20.9.

• CASE DROPPED AGAINST YOUNGER PHELPS. A son of the Rev. Fred Phelps Sr. no longer faces a criminal charge in connection with a January 1994 incident in which he called a female Shawnee County employee a sheriff's whore. Shawnee County District Attorney Joan Hamilton has dismissed a charge of disorderly conduct against Jonathan Phelps of Topeka. Two trials last year resulted in deadlocked juries. The younger Phelps frequently participates in anti-homosexual picketing of the Westboro Baptist Church, where his father is pastor. He and other family members said he used the word whore to describe the county employee as someone who is aligned with an unworthy or idolatrous cause.

• LENEXA WOMAN TRICKED, RAPED. A man tricked a woman into stopping on Interstate 35 in Lenexa, a Kansas City suburb. When the woman turned her back, the man choked her, threw her to the ground and sexually assaulted her, police said. Motorists who saw the woman struggling pulled over. Several other drivers telephoned for help. The attacker was described as a heavyset white man, 45 to 60 years old, 5 feet 7 inches tall and having a small potbelly. He had short, salt-and-pepper hair, a round face and yellow teeth. He drove a red Chevrolet conversion van that might have had Wyandotte County, handicapped tags. The 39-year-old woman was treated at a hospital and released.

Fulbright stories told at luncheon

DEBBIE HOLLIS
staff reporter

International experiences and continental cuisine came together as more than 60 K-State faculty, administrators and students attended the first Vernon Larson International Luncheon of the 1996-97 year Tuesday in the Landon Room at the Ramada Inn.

Paul Parsons, professor of journalism, and Walter Kolonosky, associate professor of modern languages, spoke on the importance of the Fulbright Scholarship program in honor of its 50th anniversary.

The Fulbright Scholarship program was founded by former U.S. Sen. J. William Fulbright in 1946 as a way for other countries to pay off their debt from World War II and promote world unity and education.

> "Few experiences enrich one's personal life more than a Fulbright."
> • PAUL PARSONS
> PROFESSOR OF JOURNALISM

Parsons was a faculty Fulbright Scholar and spent 10 months at the China School of Journalism in Beijing in 1992-93.

There, Parsons lectured on western journalism practices to students hoping to become foreign correspondents.

"Few experiences enrich one's personal life more than a Fulbright," Parsons said.

It's amazing to have the shared experience with so many others, whether it was adapting to new environments and cultures or dealing with new bathroom situations, he said.

Parsons listed some of the more well-known Fulbright alumni including Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, composer Aaron Copland and poet Maya Angelou.

"Officials had long envisioned a year-long celebration of the Fulbright's 50th anniversary," Parsons said.

Now they are concerned with keeping the program alive, he said.

Congress passed a 14-percent, $16 million cut in the program's funding last year. There is a debate over priorities within the program now, Parsons said.

The cuts will be absorbed mostly by the faculty program, he said.

Kolonosky, K-State's student Fulbright program adviser, expanded on the topic of funding cuts.

Earlier this year, Fulbright representatives from 26 countries met in Budapest to lobby their governments for increased funding. A resolution was proposed urging all 140 countries participating in the Fulbright program to put forth increased support.

Only 45 countries contribute to the program now, Kolonosky said.

Five countries contribute the same amount as or more than the U.S. to the program — Great Britain, Germany, Japan, South Korea and Spain, Kolonosky said.

K-State has had 44 student Fulbright scholars since 1952. The most recent K-State recipient, Shanté Moore, senior in political science, attended Tuesday's luncheon.

"It is surprising to me how few students we have apply," Kolonosky said.

Get the word out and get involved, he said.

K-State is currently in the recruitment period for Fulbright applicants. The deadline to turn in applications is Oct. 14.

The Vernon Larson Luncheon series was founded in 1979. It has had more speakers than any other lecture series on campus, William Richter, associate provost for international programs, said.

The series focuses on international experiences of students and faculty at K-State.

Lectures are on the first Monday in each fall month and the first Tuesday of each spring month. Anyone is welcome to attend.

Those interested in attending the luncheons or applying for a Fulbright Scholarship should contact the Office of International Programs in Fairchild 304.

Fulbright Scholarship awarded to student after run-around in application process

DEBBIE HOLLIS
staff reporter

You might get it. You didn't get it. You got it.

This was the story Shanté Moore, senior in political science, heard about his receiving a Fulbright Scholarship to Paraguay.

Moore began the application process last fall. After submitting his application and going through a University interview, Moore received K-State's nomination.

In January, the United States Information Agency, which sponsors the student Fulbright program, told Moore he was a possible grantee.

In May, Moore received a letter turning him down.

Then in August, he got the call while at work one day. Funds had become available, and Moore was the next candidate in line.

Moore will leave next February for Paraguay where he will spend 10 months to a year studying civil and military relations.

"I hope to someday become a foreign service officer for the U.S.," he said.

Moore has always been interested in international experiences.

Last summer, Moore went to India as part of K-State's international community service program.

While working on an analysis and assessment of the developed slum Ganshnagar, Moore befriended an 11-year-old boy named Yogesh.

He wanted to play a game with Moore so he could take rupees (Indian currency) from him, Moore said.

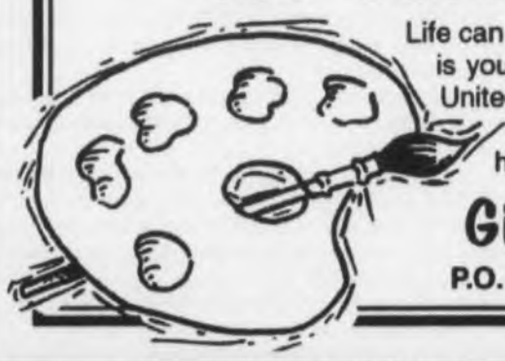
"That's how we met," he said.

Yogesh came from a poor family, Moore said.

"One day, his family went out of their way to prepare lunch for me. I stuffed my face to show my gratitude," he said.

Moore said his community service experience taught him how important it is to be involved in your own community.

"I also learned to be sensitive of other cultures — to learn and respect them," he said.



Never take what you have for granted, Moore said.

"We may be poor as college students, but our struggles are not the same as in India or Paraguay," Moore said.

Moore is also a McNair Scholar and a Truman Scholar.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Football coach owes it to the public, players to face up to what he's done

The K-State football program is in trouble again.

But this time it's not one of the players. It's a coach — one of the leaders of the team, one of the people who is supposed to set examples.

Mike Stoops, co-defensive coordinator, was arrested for a DUI and transporting an open container at 12:30 a.m. Sept. 8 on the 2300 block of Anderson Avenue.

WHY WE CARE

Mike Stoops, a football coach, was arrested on alcohol-related charges. He should face the music instead of covering them up.

Coach Bill Snyder said he spoke to Stoops about the incident, but Snyder said he believes that there are extenuating circumstances to his arrest.

Isn't if funny that he will not elaborate on what those extenuating circumstances might have been?

What kind of circumstances could possibly be extenuating enough to justify getting into a car after you've been drinking and putting other people's lives at stake?

We do not think even the most extenuating circumstances would qualify as a valid excuse.

Snyder's extenuating circumstances sound suspiciously like echoes of Chad May, Chuck Marlowe and other football players who have found themselves in uncomfortable legal situations in recent years.

The bond between a coach and his athlete is sometimes even stronger than many of the players have with their own parents.

Players look to coaches for leadership and sometimes for guidance.

If Stoops pleas his way out of this charge or makes this whole incident disappear completely, what kind of example is he setting? Those who look to him for guidance might think they can get away with the same thing.

What would be stopping them?

But Stoops has a chance to regain some of his dignity and set some sort of good example.

We think he should own up to whatever responsibility he had in the situation.

Hiding from it and covering it up will only give more bad press to the Wildcat football team.

Stoops has a responsibility to the public to show he does not believe he is above the law.

But he also has a responsibility to his players to show them the same thing.

If he decides to set an example of covering up the charges with an expensive attorney, it will only show that sports figures are above the law.

NARROWING our education

Linear tuition prevents students from broadening their minds

MY

Russell
FORTMEYER

Dear Kansas Board of Regents, Thank you for narrowing my education.

Sincerely,
Cash-strapped student #15,387

All dramatic compositional devices aside, this new system of linear tuition isn't helping me broaden my knowledge base one iota. In fact, I dare say, it's doing quite the opposite.

Nearly one year ago, Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, spoke to Student Senate concerning the new system of linear tuition, which was just in its infancy with the regents.

My main question, at the time, was whether it would be capped at 15 hours. This would mean one would pay tuition per credit hour up to 15 hours, after which one would not be charged any more. Krause told Senate this would be true.

Well, it's not true. They lied, there is no Santy Claus, and Gov. Bill Graves is running for a second term. Chalk another one up to my growing cynicism toward bureaucracy and higher-education administration.

I wouldn't be nearly as offended if I were not an engineering student (cue violins, cut to close-up of Durland Hall on a rainy night, picture me inside crying). Yes, it's true, engineers are practically forced to take at least 15, usually 16 to 18, hours to meet graduation requirements on time.

My schedule usually averages about 16 hours. So, I usually have room for an extra class — something I may want to take just for me.

Over my past three years at K-State, I've taken Introduction to Creative Writing, 20th-Century Art History and Advanced Creative Writing: Poetry. (P.S. If you can't get to sleep at night, give me a call, and I'll send some of my poetry over to you, post haste).

The problem arises in that I probably won't take these classes now that I'll be forced to pay so much more.

Not only is that bad news for me, but it makes those classes less diverse. When I took those classes, I was the only engineer in them and was able to contribute my unique life experiences (this could be considered a bad thing in some circles; you know who you are). Even worse, I'm paying more this semester than last semester, and I'm taking fewer hours.

I suppose this is part of the regents' plan of encouraging students to take classes that aren't necessarily required for their major. OK. Sure.

The message the regents are sending is one of streamlining. The message is clear: Get students in college, tell them exactly what they need to know, and get them out. No independent thought required.

On top of this, tuition went up 6 percent. Why? The Kansas Legislature added 3 percent to offset money higher education may lose because of linear tuition. The regents added its own 3 percent just to cover rising costs.

The truth? The Legislature's 3 percent has proven unnecessary because there is just as much money rolling into state coffers with linear tuition than without.

However, with tuition accountability, this money will be used at K-State and not dumped into the state kitty. I suppose that's a benefit of the system.

It still doesn't explain why there's not a cap at 15 hours.

Will we ever get a satisfactory explanation? I will when I vote anti-incumbent in this November's elections. That's right. This Legislature is more willing to cut taxes — a trendy issue — than help students.

Graves has been talking about a tax cut in 1997 for the past two years. I wonder if it has anything to do with him running for re-election in 1998?

Note to Graves: Practice loading them high and tight. You might need the skills in 1998. I'll start listening to this idea of a tax cut when the education system in this state is in better condition.

Maybe the education system is good enough in this state, but I also attend a university where top-notch faculty are underpaid.

The regents are also prodding K-State to implement a general-education plan that would force students to take at least 18 hours of classes, some of which are already included in most students' major programs.

This amounts to extra hours a student may or may not want to take but won't have a choice about.

And now, I'm punished for wanting to take an extra class.

Linear tuition should be capped and the misinformation should stop.

Russell Fortmeyer is a senior in architectural engineering. You can reach him by e-mail at (rmf@ksu.edu).

You might not talk English good either; so put your hand down

MY

Sera L.
TANK

Sitting in my College Algebra class my freshman year, I anxiously tried to work out logarithms and exponential equations.

I'm a journalism major, and quite frankly, I saw no point in doing this.

But I trucked on, punching in numbers on my $130 calculator and pulling out my hair, while the graduate teaching assistant bounced around at the front of the classroom, showing way too much enthusiasm about algebra to a class that was obviously less than enthusiastic.

Finally, the bell rang. My cue to exit my own personal hell. As I got up, I decided I didn't want to think about numbers for the rest of the week — not even if a hottie asked for my phone digits.

"I'll never understand this crap," the woman in front of me said. "The teacher can't even talk English good."

Whoa (in that Joey Lawrence way)!

Raise your hand if you don't know what's wrong with this story.

It's those of you swinging your hands over your heads like idiots who I'd like to address.

I'm sure a few misled might think the idea that I might not be good at something, such as math, is what's wrong with this sad-but-true story. But, alas, it is so. I am terrible with numbers. Ask my bank.

The problem with this story is the fact that the woman in front of me was making fun of a GTA from another country for not being able to speak English, when she herself had probably lived in this country for at least 18 years and had taken years and years of boring English and grammar classes.

Yet she still hadn't figured out the difference between an adverb and an adjective.

Hey, you, with your hand up. You still don't know what the problem is, do you?

Let's analyze the second part of the sentence the woman said.

She did all right up until the last word. Good subject-verb structure. I'm impressed that she made it that far.

But this next part is when it all goes to hell in a handbag. (While we're analyzing this, could someone tell me why one would go to or send something to hell in a handbag? I mean, why a handbag? Why not something more durable like Samsonite luggage?)

I really don't like the use of the word talk here; I prefer speak, but that's just my personal preference.

But, and this just makes me cringe, she uses the word good when she should use well.

What's the difference? you ask. She still got her point across, right?

Oh, you're the moron with your hand still waving in the air, aren't you?

Ingrain this in your brain with a hot chisel: Good is an adjective. Well is an adverb.

You say, that's only one word. So what?

Would you put your hand down, please? And get a new deodorant, will you?

Well, that woman is probably the kind who says things like "Me and Sue are going to the bar."

Maybe she should go to the bar. Her English skills might improve with a Jagermeister or two.

But I digress.

The point I'm trying to make in a round-about way is not that I have wonderful grammar. I don't. But I also don't complain about people who make a sincere effort to speak our language but have some problems.

You people who gripe and complain about international teachers not being able to speak English are probably the same ones who can't speak it yourselves.

And what you probably don't realize — mostly, because you're too busy poking fun of others to think about anything besides going to the bar with Sue — is that these teachers, who bring a wealth of knowledge and culture, speak another language perfectly.

So, you say, I talk good enough to get my point across. I'm an engineering major. I don't need to have good grammar.

OK, if you say so.

But I say differently.

Talking is a social skill. It is not specific to one field of study or profession.

If you're at a job interview or cocktail party and say something like, "You make more money than me," you'll sound unrefined, uncultured and just plain stupid. And, if I might add, it will be no wonder she makes more money than you do if you speak like that.

I don't want to sound condescending, nor will I say that I have perfect grammar.

English is a difficult language to learn, and it is constantly evolving. But before you make fun of others' less than perfect language skills, you might want to take a look at your own.

Being white is nothing to be ashamed of

Editor,

This is in response to a recent column on acknowledging skin color.

I agreed with the piece up to a point, but there were some things left unsaid that deserve to be brought up. In light of this, I'm sure my letter will be very unpopular with some, but nevertheless a truth is still a truth, even when unpopular.

I feel absolutely no cumulative guilt for racial injustice in the past nor do I feel any personal responsibility or accountability for current prejudice or discrimination in this country.

There is a dangerous trend these days in trying to make white people bare an unwarranted burden in all of this.

Study the past, learn from the past certainly, but don't live in it.

I recently saw just a portion of a news story on television. In it, a woman was making a point that any small group in this country should not have a larger voice or influence than is proportional to industry, but it was interesting inasmuch as such a principle should also hold true in other aspects in life.

Our democratic system is based on majority rule (opinion, not race) and that's the way it should be. Other than that, all people are equal; discrimination is still discrimination, even reversed.

The United States was founded generally on a European heritage, and that is a fact. A majority of the population is white, and that is also a fact. I don't like the derisive comment that most of the major wars started in Europe.

I could counter with, few if any industrial or technological advancements ever originated in Africa. So? Both are just smoke screens to the fact that the white race has nothing to be ashamed of and quite a bit to be genuinely proud of.

Shame is not something you inherit; it's something you bring upon yourself. And, that is regardless of race.

Fraternity less than gracious to deliverer

Editor,

On Aug. 25, I delivered a pizza to 1814 Fairchild Ave. All the lights were off on the porch, so it took a while to find the address.

After I knocked on the door, a man standing next to a car in the parking lot about 10 feet away told me to go on in. I responded, "I'm sorry, I don't go into any house." In response, a male voice said, "It's OK. It will only hurt of a little bit."

I heard a few male laughs and yelled an obscenity. One of the men walked up to the house, went inside and got the guy who ordered the pizza. I explained that I was never going to deliver another pizza to that address and left.

When I returned to work, we called the police. A police officer responded and went to 1814 Fairchild Ave.

When the officer called me at work, he explained that the men at Lambda Chi Alpha, 1814 Fairchild Ave., did not know who the man was who yelled, "It's OK. It will only hurt of a little bit."

It sounded a bit fishy to me, seeing that the guy who went inside the house was outside talking to the man who yelled the comment in the parking lot.

I want the students at K-State to know about this and make their own judgment about the character of the members of Lambda Chi Alpha.

Fans should be respectful of others

Editor,

Like a lot of other people Saturday, I was at the football game. But, unlike a few I chose to respect the people around me.

Tailgating and football seem to go hand-in-hand, and most of the tailgaters there were probably drinking beer.

My problem is not with people drinking beer, but with those who are drinking who lose their common sense and self-control and start to act like idiots.

I have two examples of this.

The first one is while my 3-year-old daughter was playing in the open hatchback of my car, two boys (because in no way can they be considered men) urinated between the rows of cars.

Then they added to the problem by being sarcastic and rude, because I took offense that they were pissing in front of my daughter.

This is not a positive reflection on the K-State student body.

Can't we do better than that?

The second example is the boys screaming F___ KU before and after the football team played Indiana State. Their reason for yelling this remains a mystery to me, and now my daughter has a wonderful phrase. What I am trying to say is eat, drink and be merry, but not at the expense of those around you.

Expansion-proposal process complete

MIKE O'LEARY
staff reporter

A proposal for the expansion of Manhattan City Hall will be presented to the city commission next week by City Manager Gary Greer.

After five months of citizen input, pre-design studies by Brent Bowman and Associates, architects, and three citizen steering committee meetings, the proposal is ready for the commission's action.

"On the (Sept.) 17th, I intend to ask for design based on the recommendation of the architects and the steering committee to expand the current site," Greer said at Tuesday's commission work session.

The proposal is the result of a great deal of effort, including a survey of Manhattan residents circulated by the library, the city offices and the Manhattan Mercury.

"I've lived in this town since 1965. I've never seen a city commission as receptive to the public," said Lindel Niberg, a neighbor of City Hall.

During the process, various neighborhood citizens and others voiced their concerns about neighborhood and historic preservation.

This issue was a concern for the commission and the architect.

"Potential is there to expand city hall adequately while still maintaining neighborhood integrity. There is a whole other level of issues that are a part of the design," said Bowman of the preservation of the area's tradition.

Much of the the interim discussion during the work session centered around the need for more long-term planning by the city staff and the commissioners.

"I think a minor expansion is a short-term solution. We also need to look at the long term," Greer said.

The commissioners echoed the city manager's concerns.

"We need to keep our minds open to what the future might bring," commissioner Steve Hall said.

Phase 2 of the expansion project, the design of the addition and renovation, will begin if the commission approves the city manager's recommendation at the Sept. 17 meeting.

Hawaii continues same-sex union debate

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HONOLULU — Three years after Hawaii's Supreme Court all but declared the state's ban on gay marriages unconstitutional, the debate about whether to recognize homosexual unions returned to the courtroom today.

"A child raised by his or her biological parents has a better opportunity for development," said Deputy Attorney General Rick Eichor in his opening statement in the civil trial. "This is not a case of gay-bashing."

Dan Foley, attorney for the three gay couples who sued the state for denying them marriage licenses, said there is no way to prove a child raised by same-sex parents would be any worse off.

"Today in Hawaii a law-abiding, tax-paying couple of the same sex cannot marry," Foley said. "A convicted murderer serving a life term in prison can get married."

Two of the couples he represents were in court today.

The case is being closely watched around the country. Because the U.S. Constitution requires states to recognize each other's laws, gay marriages performed in Hawaii might well be recognized in other states as well.

In fact, the trial opened just as the U.S. Senate gave final congressional approval to the Defense of Marriage Act, which would bar federal recognition of same-sex marriages and allow states to do the same. President Clinton has said he will sign the legislation.

The trial comes three years after the state Supreme Court touched off a political, religious and social furor when it said the state's ban on gay marriages is unconstitutional unless the government can show a compelling interest in keeping it.

Whatever the outcome of the 10- to 12-day trial in Circuit Court, the fight will return to the Supreme Court on appeal.

The state's witnesses will include psychologists who will testify that a family unit with a married mother and father gives a child the best environment in which to develop. Similarly, the plaintiffs plan to call child psychologists to make the case that gay couples can be good parents.

Should Judge Kevin Chang rule in favor of same-sex marriages, he is expected to stay his ruling to prevent gay couples from getting licenses until the state Supreme Court hears the case again.

Already anticipating the Hawaii court's ruling, 16 states have acted to refuse recognition to same-sex marriages performed elsewhere, while 18 other states have considered such a law and rejected it.

ROUND 2:

WILL CINCINNATI RETURN THE FAVOR FROM LAST YEAR AND UPSET K-STATE?

Last game was a doozy

DAVE GUNTHER
contributing writer

As Saturday's game against Cincinnati approaches, it would be hard not to remember last year's game against the Bearcats.

Lockett

On the road in Cincinnati, the Wildcats found themselves clawing for a victory. Wide receiver Kevin Lockett caught the game-winning, 22-yard pass from Matt Miller in the final second of the game to give the Cats their 23-21 victory.

Lockett said each person in the three-pronged receiving corps of Lockett, Tyson Schwieger and Mitch Running wanted a chance to make the necessary play.

"Coach Snyder called a play we don't work on much, and I ended up with the ball. No one was afraid to be a failure, and that gave Coach Snyder a lot of confidence," Lockett said.

Heading into Saturday's game, Lockett said he hopes his last-minute heroics won't be needed.

"We hate for games to come down to the wire, like last year's did, but a win is a win. We are going to try and put this one away early," he said. "I think we have a little to prove, after reading how they dominated all aspects of last year's game, and them saying that our win was a fluke. We want to prove to them and to everyone else that it wasn't a fluke."

Cincinnati has seven starters returning on defense, including safety Sam Garnes, who intercepted six passes against the Cats last year.

"We are not expecting anything different from Cincinnati's defense than what we saw last year," Lockett said. "What they did worked well for them. They will probably throw in a few extra little things to mix it up a bit, but they are very experienced, have good athletes and play very well together." Lockett said.

But even more than their talent and experience, Lockett said the Bearcats have a different motivation.

"Cincinnati didn't get off to a good start this year, and they are going to come here looking to upset a top-25 team on the road," Lockett said.

> "We want to prove to them and everyone else that it wasn't a fluke."
> • KEVIN LOCKETT
> SENIOR WIDE RECEIVER

Lockett said K-State's offense has made improvements since the first game against Texas Tech, but that it is difficult to judge the extent of those improvements against Indiana State.

"Indiana State is not the same caliber team that we are going to play week in and week out," he said. "We have made improvements in areas like picking up the blitz, and our overall timing has improved. We are looking forward to playing on Saturday."

Players want respect from Bearcats this time around

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Forgive the K-State football team if it takes Saturday's game against Cincinnati personally.

After all, it was K-State who crawled out of Nippert Stadium in Cincinnati last year with a 23-21 come-from-behind victory.

But Coach Bill Snyder said he doesn't take last year's loss personally.

"I know that they felt that they should have won the game," Snyder said of the Bearcats. "I can't say that I disagree."

The Wildcats gave up a 67-yard scoring pass on the second play from scrimmage and then fell behind 14-0 while managing only two first downs in the first half last year.

But they clawed themselves out of a hole, led by quarterback Matt Miller. With 44 seconds remaining in the game, and down 21-17, the Wildcats regained possession of the ball at their own 41-yard line.

Miller scrambled for eight yards on the first play and five more on the second for a first down at the Cincinnati 46.

After an incomplete pass and a delay of game penalty and yet another incomplete pass, K-State faced third and 15 at its own 49-yard line.

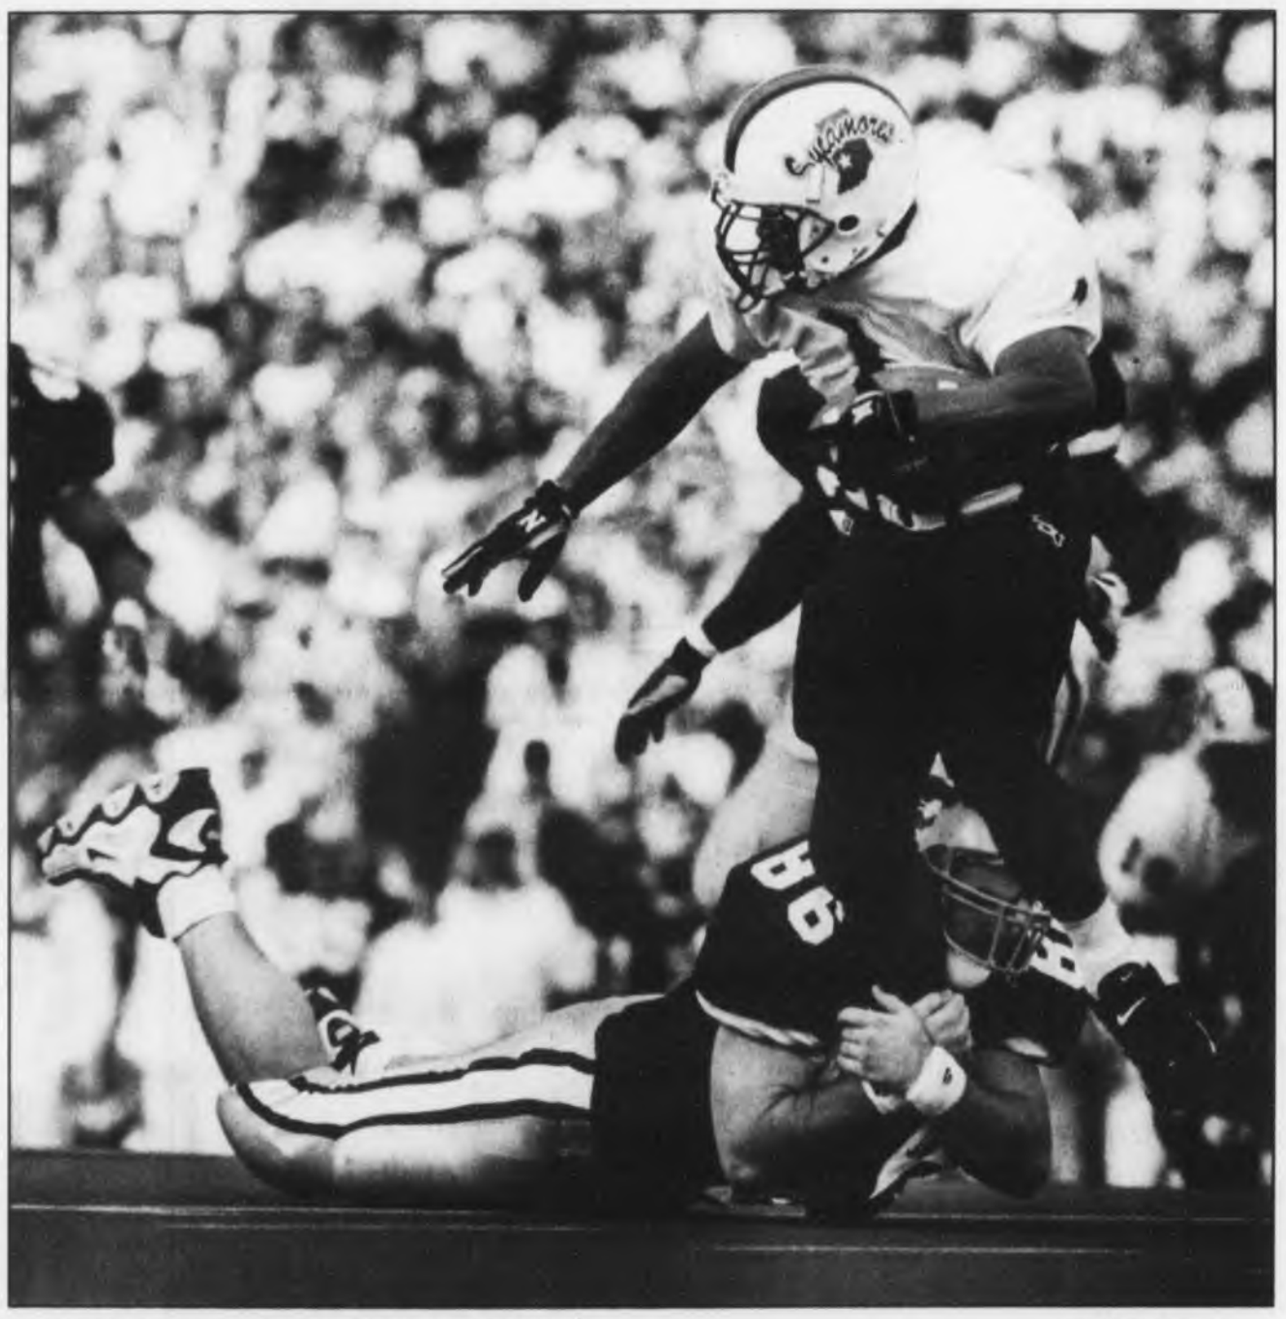
Miller then connected with wide receiver Tyson Schwieger for a 20-yard pass and a first down at the Cincinnati 31-yard line. Another completed pass, this time to Mitch Running, gave the Cats nine more yards.

With three seconds left and 22-yards to go until the end zone, Miller rolled left and threw to the right where Kevin Lockett caught the ball at the goal line and dove in as time ran out.

That touchdown pass gave the Cats the win and set the tone for an intensity level Saturday comparable to that of a K-State vs. Nebraska level.

"This is real personal," K-State defensive back Chris Canty said. "After the game last year, they said we weren't so good. I think after you beat someone you should get some respect. They didn't show us any respect."

Quarterback Brian Kavanagh agreed.



"After that game, I couldn't blame Cincinnati for being upset," he said. "They're going to come in here with all the confidence in the world."

Snyder said that although Cincinnati started the season slowly with a 34-14 loss to Tulane, the Bearcats improved themselves for last week's game against Kentucky, a 24-3 victory. He said there was no reason to think they wouldn't be even more improved when they come to Manhattan.

"Defensively, I think they tackled better. They're more sound. I think there was improvement in terms of science. They made mental mistakes against Tulane," Snyder said.

Snyder even went so far as to say the Bearcats are similar to Texas Tech in many ways. The quarterback position is just one of those ways.

"They can spread their offense out, causing your defense to spread out," he said. "And they're pretty good on special teams. They're good, good athletes."

TIGHT END Justin Swift tackles Indiana State's punt returner, Larry Scally, in the Wildcats' 59-3 blowout of the Sycamores last week. K-State will play Cincinnati this year. The Bearcats lead the series 4-1, but the Wildcats swiped a 23-21come-from-behind victory last season in Cincinnati. Saturday's kickoff has been changed to 11:30 a.m. so that it may be televised as a regional game of the week on Fox Sports Net.

Back-up Beasley showed fans what the future could be like

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

Fans who remained for the second half of Saturday night's game were introduced to the future of K-State football.

In a 59-3 blowout of Indiana State, the opportunity arose for true freshman Jonathan Beasley to gain some game-time experience.

Beasley entered the game in the second half to make his collegiate debut. On the 13th snap, Beasley showed K-State fans a preview of a promising future.

On the play, Beasley scrambled around and threw a 57-yard bomb on the run to Troy Hackney. Hackney made the catch and dove into the end zone.

"I saw that they were blitzing me, so I turned and ran the other way and let it go," Beasley said.

Coach Bill Snyder said the touchdown showed off some of Beasley's qualities.

"The touchdown pass was an excellent look at him coming out of the pocket and scrambling, not prematurely, and throwing the ball on the run," Snyder said.

After the catch was made, Beasley sprinted down the field to the end zone.

"I was just excited, since it was my first touchdown here at K-State," Beasley said.

Just two possessions before the touchdown pass, Beasley almost experienced another first at K-State, nearly throwing an interception that could have resulted in an easy touchdown by the Sycamores.

"It was probably good that it happened now so that it won't happen again," Snyder said.

Going into the season, Cody Lee Smith was listed as the backup quarterback. But with the reccurrence of a stomach ailment, the position was up for grabs.

> "For a freshman to come in here and learn these things that quick is tremendous."
> • DANA DIMEL
> OFFENSIVE COORDINATOR

Offensive coordinator Dana Dimel said there were a number of things the coaching staff liked about Beasley.

"He is very athletic. He can make a lot of things happen," Dimel said. "He's a pretty good scrambler, and he has a very strong arm."

Dimel also said Beasley made huge strides in learning the system at K-State.

"He's really done a great job," Dimel said. "For a freshman to come in here and learn these things that quick is tremendous. He's really surprised all of us."

Both Dimel and Beasley know how important it is for Beasley to get into some game situations.

"It is important to get Jonathan into the game and get some snaps from center," Dimel said.

"It helps to get some of those nerves out of your system," Beasley said. "It also helps you out mentally. It makes you feel like you can go out and do the job."

All the birthday presents in the world would make my day

One month from today will be my birthday. I'm going to be old – 24 years old, to be exact.

My dad asked me a couple weeks ago what I'd like for my birthday. I didn't really have an answer for him. I've been thinking about it ever since.

After Saturday's game against Indiana State, I realized it didn't matter what I wanted. My dad just wanted an answer.

My parents never give me what I want, anyway. There'd be no surprise in that, would there?

Every year, they ask me the same question: "What do you want for your birthday?"

MY Shana
NEWELL

Except for those youthful years when my mind overflowed with wonderful gifts that even Dr. Seuss probably wouldn't have considered, I didn't have an answer.

And then it hit me. Is that what football players feel like during post-game press conferences?

Do they get tired of the same old ordinary questions from us poor, blubbering reporters who are just trying to get the story done so we can go drink?

Then I thought a little more.

We don't ask the same questions game in and game out. It depends on the circumstances.

Be careful. I'm thinking so much, my head is starting to steam, .

It's the players who come up with the same phrase week in and week out.

Don't believe me? Take a look at the story right next to this one. What does Kavanagh say?

"They're going to come in here with all the confidence in the world," he said about Cincinnati.

In Todd Stewart's coverage of the Indiana State game, Kavanagh had another creative response to a reporter's question.

"That performance doesn't surprise me at all," Kavanagh said about Marlon Charles' 195-yard rushing game. "He's got all the talent in the world."

Do you see a trend growing here?

Let me add one more Kavanagh-ism.

Earlier this semester, I interviewed Kavanagh about the challenges of beginning competition in the Big 12 Conference, or something to that matter.

I asked him about his confidence in his receiving corps.

Want to fill in the blanks?

"I don't worry about them," he said. "I've got _ _ _ the _ _ _ _ _ _ _ _ _ _ in the _ _ _ _ _ in them."

Couldn't figure it out? Let me make it easy for you. "I've got all the confidence in the world in them."

I'm not saying Kavanagh is uncreative. I'm not saying he's dumb, either.

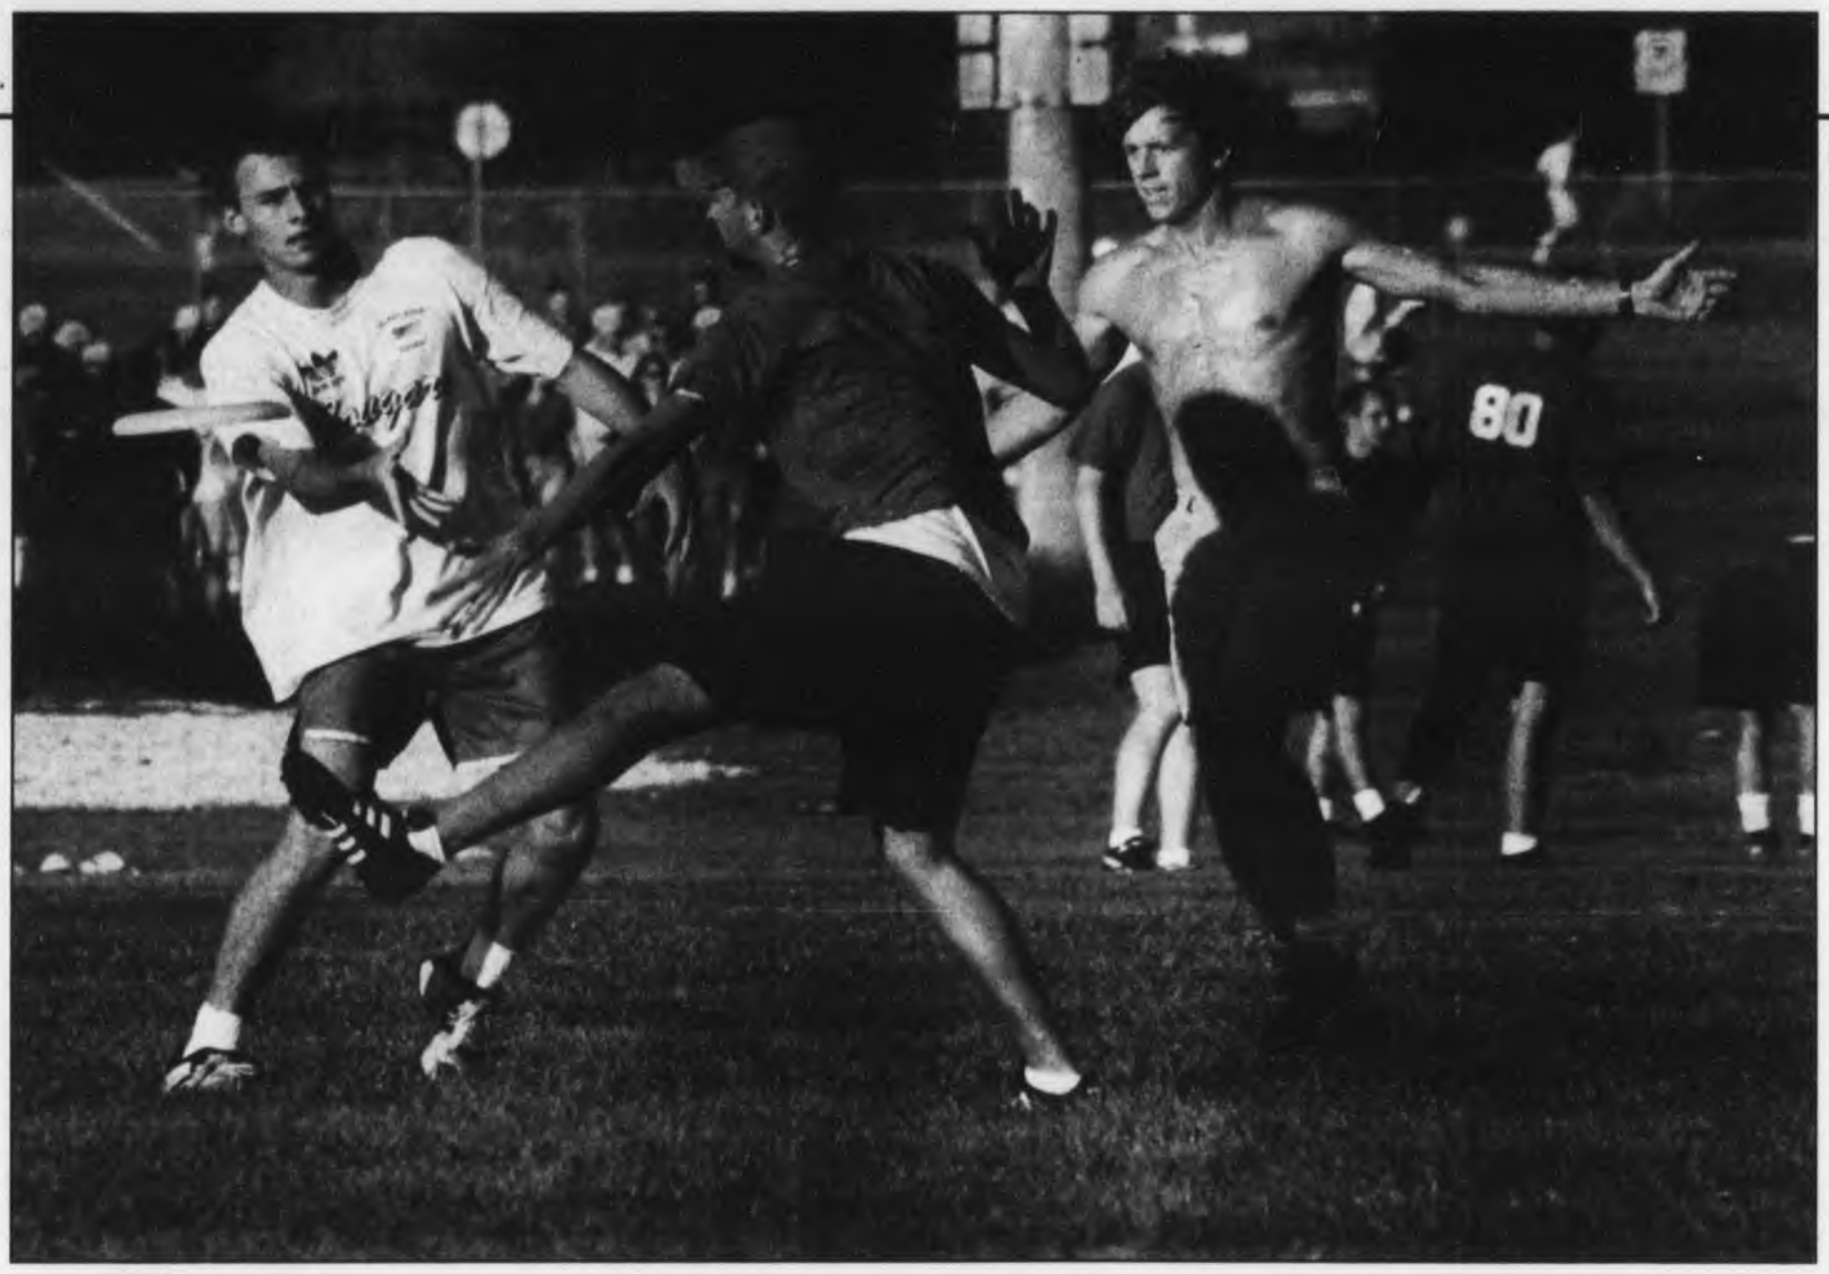
Heck, I could never read an opposing team's defense the way he does.

In my opinion, it takes some serious gray matter in the head to do some of the things football players do, although sometimes it could be easy to argue they've taken one too many bashes to the head for that gray matter to really work properly. But that's another column.

Listening to Kavanagh and some of the other players talk reminds me of the scene in "Bull Durham" when Crash Davis instructs Nuke on how to speak to the press.

I want to know who prepared Kavanagh for his press-conference speeches. Perhaps it is the same person who writes campaign speeches for presidential candidates.

And football players aren't the only ones guilty of preparing key phrases. There's a particular coach, and I won't name names, on this campus who, I truly believe, prides himself in not revealing anything new about his team during post-event press conferences.



I guarantee you that at this point in the column, Snyder, Coach Tom Asbury and just about every other coach on this campus is asking, "Does she mean me?"

Don't worry, coaches. It's not that big a deal. We find other ways to get around Al Gore-type speeches. It's our job. We just find it amusing.

So while Kavanagh worries about what word he's going to substitute for confidence and talent in his key phrase, I'm going to go back to figuring out what I want for my birthday.

Maybe I'll ask for all the money in the world, all the compact discs in the world, all the baseball teams in the world, all the ....

Carter practicing at wide receiver

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Move over, Deion. Here comes Dale.

While some of Kansas City's full-time pass-catchers let injuries heal this week, two-time Pro Bowl cornerback Dale Carter is working out at wide receiver.

It's unlikely he'll get on the field at Seattle this week on offense, coaches say, let alone join Dallas' Deion Sanders as a full-time two-way star.

But it could happen. With Tamarick Vanover probably out of action with a painful rib injury and Lake Dawson slowed by a jammed thunb, the receiver position has become alarmingly depleted at Arrowhead Stadium.

Plus, if nothing else, it gives Seattle coaches something else to worry about.

"My thought was before we could play, we have to practice," coach Marty Schottenheimer said Tuesday. "And a part of the practice involves 7-on-7 passing drills, things like that. Given our status with regard to injuries, I was just looking for a guy who could line up and run fast. He can certainly do that. He also catches it well."

Possibly the Chiefs' best athlete, Carter has played a little offense in the past on gimmick plays. But will he be catching passes from Steve Bono this week in the Kingdome?

"I don't foresee it happening," Schottenheimer said.

Versatile running back Todd McNair lined up at wide receiver a couple of times late in the Chiefs' 19-3 victory over Oakland Sunday after Dawson and Vanover went out. Backup wide receiver Danan Hughes finished the game with a swollen hand that made catching the ball difficult.

Kansas City's receiver corps was further weakened by injuries to tight ends Keith Cash and Derrick Walker, who are not expected back for Seattle. Backup Reggie Johnson played most of the Raider game.

allies had effectively eliminated the Kurdish safe haven established by U.S.-led forces five years ago.

A State Department spokesman ridiculed Saddam's amnesty offer, saying past treachery made the gesture laughable, almost comical.

"He gave a pardon to his son-in-law and then had him executed," Nicholas Burns said. "He tried to make up with the Iraqi Kurds five years ago and then tried to destroy them."

The latest fighting in northern Iraq began Aug. 31, when the Iraqi army and the KDP teamed up to capture Irbil, the de facto Kurdish capital in the north.

U.S. missile strikes against southern Iraq last week seemed to deter the Iraqi army from taking part in further fighting, although Burns said Iraqi intelligence, military and security advisers apparently continued to aid the KDP. With Iraqi forces marching behind the KDP, the faction has easily defeated its Kurdish rival, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

In addition to launching missiles against Iraqi military installations, the U.S. and allied nations expanded the no-fly zone in southern Iraq.

Saddam retorted not only by announcing he would no longer honor the no-fly zones but also by ordering his forces to shoot at U.S. and allied aircraft.

Iraq claimed Tuesday it fired three surface-to-air missiles at allied aircraft over the no-fly zone, but no hits were reported. It was the fourth time in five days Iraq has reported shooting at warplanes over the zone.

In Sulaymaniyah, Iraqi troops were nowhere in sight Tuesday as the KDP celebrated its sweeping victory with an impromptu parade.

About 20 miles northeast of Sulaymaniyah, KDP fighters looted everything they could carry from the headquarters of the Iranian-allied PUK.

In Sulaymaniyah, only a few leading PUK members chose to remain.

"I don't think we're in any danger. Only Talabani and about 10 other important PUK members are the ones whose lives are at risk," said Majid Haji Ahmed, a senior member of the PUK council in Sulaymaniyah. "It's better than being a refugee."

But many Kurds showed little faith in Saddam after so many harsh crackdowns directed at them in the past.

Men are selling their organs, and a kidney can be sold for $300.

"Families are selling the windows and doors off their houses just to feed their children," she said.

The problem goes beyond lack of money. Food is also scarce.

"I know a family who has three children and must choose one child each day to eat one meal — breakfast. That's it," Al-Rawi said.

A man killed all of his children, his wife and then himself, because he could not feed them, Nabel Al-Ani, graduate student in education, said. In that culture, the man provides everything for the family, and if he can't, he feels like a failure, he said.

"He was so desperate, he killed his family and himself," Al-Ani said.

Khamis said there also is no medicine.

"You hear stories of dentists extracting teeth without anesthesia," Khamis said.

Al-Rawi said there are not even the simplest medicines.

"The people there are suffering," Al-Rawi said.

The sanctions are too much, Al-Ani said. For six years, the sanctions have been imposed and are not achieving the desired result, he said.

"If you try an experiment and after six years you don't get the results, you try something else," Al-Ani said.

During the past six years, a new generation has been born and raised on the bare minimum, Al-Ani said. Malnutrition and birth defects plague the babies who survive, he said.

"This is going to stay in their memories," he said. "They won't grow up right."

Al-Ani said if the goal is to keep Iraq from having weapons and military technology, then the sanctions should be on the countries who sell Iraq the weapons and supplies.

"We don't have the resources on ourselves," Al-Ani said. "Other countries sell them to us."

Khamis said everyone must take action.

"We are calling on the American administration to stop the game," Khamis said. "Think of the people, and lift the sanctions."

The recent U.S. missile strikes in Iraq have been in response to the Iraqi government's intervention in the Kurd uprising in northern Iraq.

An article from Star News Service printed in Monday's Kansas City Star reported the Iraqi government was asked to support the Kurdistan Democratic Party in its efforts to regain control of Irbil, the Kurdish capital.

For the past five years, Masoud Barzani, of the KDP, has been a key player in the Iraqi National Congress. The INC is a coalition of Kurdish and Shiite groups formed under U.S. support and CIA funding, according to the article.

The Kurds have been fighting among themselves since the early 1960s.

The Kurds decided living under the Iraqi government was better than living like refugees, Al-Ani said.

"In Turkey, if a Kurd is dancing and celebrating in his own language, he will be executed," Khamis said.

In Iraq, they are not prosecuted, he said.

"The Kurds in Iraq have two rights," he said. "One, they are Kurds and have autonomy. They have their own place, their own government, their own university."

The Kurds are Iraqi and have the same rights as any other Iraqi, said Khamis. They can live and work wherever they want, and they are represented in the Iraqi government, he said.

Sympathy, money and help are not what Iraq is looking for, Al-Rawi said.

"We don't want anyone to interfere," she said.

Residents spoke of watching the father of the drowned sisters trying to save the younger girl, only to have the surging waters drag her from his hands, volunteer rescue worker Jose Melendez said.

Melendez said he and other men tied themselves together with belts and ropes to try to save five people.

But they had to abandon their efforts as the swollen river rose ever higher. Civil defense officials also abandoned the rescue effort.

"There are a number of people still missing, but we don't know how many. They could be in the sea," Melendez said.

Police Sgt. Haron Ramirez, at the scene, said six were missing.

In the south, more than 200 homes were destroyed or severely damaged around the city of Ponce, civil defense and police reported.

In the worst-hit shantytown, Punta Diamante, Evelyn Rentas came back to rescue belongings from her roofless, flooded home. Among them, she carried a portrait of Puerto Rico's Gov. Pedro Rossello.

At the east-coast town of Naguabo, which got a half-year's worth of rain in a half-day with 17.9 inches, people locked themselves inside their homes, afraid to venture out in the deluge.

Vancouver, Rahim was the third-overall pick in June's draft.

Forward Tremaine Fowlkes transferred to Fresno State and guard Jelani Gardner to Pepperdine.

Cal athletic director John Kasser has set Sept. 15 as the deadline for hiring a replacement for Bozeman. If he is unable to do so, Kasser has said he plans to let Bears assistant coach Billy Kennedy take over the program for the upcoming basketball season.

Asbury is 29-27 after two years as head of the Wildcat program. Last season, the Wildcats went 17-12, earning a berth in the NCAA Tournament. It was the Cats' first NCAA Tournament appearance in three years.

The former Pepperdine coach has recruited for size and power in recent years. Among the newest recruits are 7'0" Dax Jones and 7'1" Joe Leonard. Jones is a transfer from Cloud County Community College and Leonard is a freshman from St. Louis.

Asbury said he still has work to do at K-State and has not stopped preparing the Wildcats for this season.

"The task I came to complete at K-State is not nearly finished, and my focus will remain on the fall recruiting for the Wildcats and preparing my team for play this season," Asbury said.

That recruiting has extended past this season.

Asbury has received an oral commitment from Adam Lopez, a 5'11" point guard from St. Mary's High School in Phoenix, Ariz. Lopez's brother Damon played for Asbury while Asbury was at Pepperdine.

Lopez will sign with the Cats when the early signing period begins in November and will most likely redshirt the 1997-98 season.

that the family's solid wood door appeared about to burst in, Baigés said.

Puerto Rico is in the height of hurricane season, so many people tape their windows and stock up on supplies to get them through storms.

"You get a gas stove, a lot of water. Half of the carport in our house is supplies that we use in a hurricane, you know, candles and stuff," Baigés said. "My mom buys bottled water. She usually tries to do a lot of cooking. That's the nice things about hurricanes — you know it's coming. Not like a tornado where it's like, duck or you're going to get hit."

Baigés, who, like Diaz-Bautista and Laster, is a member of Hispanic American Leadership Organization, found a lot of support among the members.

"I went to the HALO meeting, and everyone asked about my family," she said.

Benjamin Torres, HALO member and junior in mechanical engineering, also confirmed the safety of his family members, who live in Ponce.

"That's where the hurricane was supposed to hit, but the eye, I guess, missed it," Torres said.

Most of the damage occurred in the Ponce and Mayagüez areas, where Baigés and Laster are from.

Exercise has different connotations to different individuals. Equipment such as the cardiovascular machines and free weights, along with activities including aerobics classes and intramural sports, allow each student who visits the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex to create a unique exercise routine.

"All of the equipment you can think of is here," said Chad Jacobs, junior in secondary education, who uses the free-weight area of the Rec six times a week. "It's a lot better than it was before they added on to it. You never feel like you're crowded."

Any student can easily use the Rec Complex because of the availability of information on equipment use, said Sandra Coutin-Rodicio, graduate student in nuclear engineering, who uses the Precor Transport Systems, Stairmasters and free weights.

"You can ask the staff questions on how to use the machines, and there are also directions posted on all of the machines," Coutin-Rodicio said.

Several students compared the Rec Complex to other University exercise centers they had used in the past. Bethany Kline, senior in psychology, who had just completed the 5:30 p.m. aerobics class at the Rec Complex, said the workout classes were better than the exercise programs at the University of Kansas.

"I went to KU, and I paid all of this money to join an aerobics club on campus," Kline said. "It's nice at K-State because I have all of this accessible to me at no cost."

While using one of the Stairclimbers, Joel Engel, graduate student in animal science who transferred to K-State from the University of Nebraska, said he also enjoyed the Rec Complex more than Nebraska's facility.

"The equipment is better and newer, and there's a lot more of it," Engel said.

Two students said the Rec replaced some more negative things they could be doing with their time.

While studying the blue spiral notebook on a stand in front of her, Katie Anderson, a junior in accounting, walked on a treadmill.

"The more you exercise, the less you sleep," Anderson said. "Exercising makes me feel like I'm not wasting my time watching TV or something like that. I also review my notes while I exercise. I don't read text or anything like that, but some people do. They bring their highlighters and everything."

Exercising at the Rec Complex also occupies some time in which Chris Stork, a sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, said he might be engaged in other, less-productive activities.

"It keeps me in shape, and it also keeps me out of trouble," Stork said. "It keeps me out of the bars."

Non-residents to pay higher percentage of tuition

SPEEDREAD

- Increased costs for out-of-state students are the result of the state's economic situation and the theory students were not paying enough of their education.

HEATHER HOLLINGSWORTH
contributing writer

Changing attitudes and state finances have left out-of-state students paying a larger percentage of their educational bill.

Looking back at old figures clearly demonstrates this trend. Between 1977 and 1997 the average annual increase was 7.9 percent for residents and 9.9 percent for non-residents.

"What they've tried to do in Kansas is get to the point where non-residents are paying closer to the full cost of their education," Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president, said.

"Maybe in years past that didn't occur in Kansas where it had occurred in other states."

A combination of factors has led to students paying increasingly more of their educational costs in the last 10 years, said Ray Hauke, director of planning and budget for the Kansas Board of Regents.

The first factor is the state's economic situation was not that great, Hauke said.

Reduced tax money caused students to pay more of their tuition, Hauke said.

Also, a popular legislative theory was students were not paying a big enough percentage of their college education, Hauke said.

Non-residents may not necessarily consider paying more than their in-state counterparts pay to be a detriment.

Out-of-state students enter the college-selection process with the knowledge that they will have to pay more, said Jenni Cheatham, senior in elementary education from Oklahoma City.

"It's a land-grant school," Cheatham said. "They have an obligation to help state students first."

> "It's a land-grant school. They have an obligation to help state students first."
> • JENNI CHEATHAM
> SENIOR IN ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

Despite increases, non-residents still pay less than they would at peer institutions, Hauke said.

The average out-of-state tuition for K-State's peer institutions is $4,253, compared to $3,958 at K-State.

Cheatham noted this difference when she was shopping for a college.

"Relative to other out-of-state schools, K-State is inexpensive," she said.

This sentiment was shared by another student fresh from the college-selection process.

Jamie Simon, freshman in elementary education, said K-State tuition was similar to tuition at other schools she visited. In fact, K-State compared favorably to her home state of Colorado's resident tuition.

"Where I am from, in-state tuition is high," she said.

The change to linear fees means out-of-state students now pay $265 a credit hour. For students taking 14 hours, the difference between fall 1996 and spring 1996 is $32.

But, for students taking larger loads, tuition bills increased. Every hour adds $265 to the tuition bill.

Simon said linear tuition would not affect her class loads.

"I want to get my major done in four years," she said. "I have to take what I'm going to take for my major."

Currently out-of-state students only make up about 10 percent of the student body, Schellhardt said. Will that percentage change?

Simon said she has a $10,000-a-year tuition budget.

But students who have a budget smaller than that may have been turned away by recent changes.

"Going to this methodology may have said to a non-resident student, 'Maybe I should stay in state,'" Schellhardt said, "but we don't have any data to show if our non-resident students are down."

Students pay more of bill

Students are paying a proportionally larger percentage of their educational costs, particularly non-residents. Read on to see how K-State compares to its peer institutions.

Author challenges GOP policies about women

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

Tanya Melich believed the Republican Party was the Grand Old Party, but she worked for President Clinton's 1992 campaign.

Melich's book, "The Republican War Against Women," chronicles her growing disenchantment with the party through the past 40 years or so.

Melich describes how the religious right gained so much influence in the GOP.

She says even though moderate and old-guard Republicans disagreed with this development, they looked the other way for the good of the party.

These moderates, including herself, thought the religious right would help Republicans win elections. They thought once the elections were won, the Republican office-holders would implement their own less-extreme policies.

Obviously, Melich suffered disappointments due to this faith in these elected Republicans.

She writes the religious right began creeping into the party in the mid-1960s and has continued to tighten its grip on Republican leadership and control much of the party's legislative action.

Melich says the religious right engineered most of the Republican Party's policies affecting women in the last 25 years. She gives specific examples of this trend.

One of the best examples is the Republican Party's view on abortion. Melich describes the GOP's deteriorating support for choice by chronicling national Republican conventions through the 1970s and 1980s.

Of the 1984 Republican Party platform, Melich writes, "Words respecting the views of pro-choice Republicans, so hard fought in 1976 and watered down in 1980, were now gone. The new language was uncompromisingly anti-choice and included a new sentence: 'The unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life which cannot be infringed.'"

Similarly, President Bush's views toward women — and how they changed when he ran for president — demonstrate the religious right's effect on Republican presidential hopefuls.

These candidates did not feel they could win without conforming to the religious right's views.

In the 1960s, Bush was a strong supporter of the Equal Rights Amendment.

His wife Barbara supported Planned Parenthood, and he tenaciously supported family planning in his early days in Congress.

Once Bush began his bid for president, he abandoned all these views. He was pro-life and no longer supported the ERA.

I was skeptical when I began reading "The Republican War Against Women."

I did not think a Republican woman would honestly criticize the Republican Party. I was surprised because she did, and she did it matter-of-factly.

That tone and Melich's evidence made her case convincing.

I was born after the religious right began its take-over of the Republican Party.

Consequently, I have always thought of the GOP and the religious right as almost the same thing.

This book changed the way I think about the Republican Party.

Although Melich did not make excuses for the GOP, she did point out that many Republicans disagree with people like Newt Gingrich and Ralph Reed of the Christian Coalition.

Melich makes it clear the Republican Party and the religious right are not the same thing.

It's just that the national- and sometimes state- Republican leaders are under the religious right's thumb.

She convincingly asserts that the religious right has had too much influence on the Republican Party's policies regarding abortion, child care and women who work outside the home.

Because Melich devoted most of her professional life to the Republican Party, her criticism is relevant and believable.

Expansion in the future for international center

ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

The International Student Center will probably undergo construction on an expansion next summer.

Possible additions include a children's room, conference rooms and more offices. The current multi-purpose room will also be renovated.

The center has raised $192,000 in private funds of the $250,000 total to be raised for the expansion.

Manuri Nakkawita, junior in advertising and vice president of International Coordinating Council, said she likes the idea of the center expanding.

"I think it's a great thing," she said.

Nakkawita said the problem with the building is lack of space. She said when international students have meetings, they often have to meet off campus because there isn't enough space for students to meet at the center.

Nakkawita said another positive result of the expansion is the center will attract more international students.

Ruth Ann Wefald, co-chair of the Expansion Committee, said the new space is necessary because of the number of students using the center. When it opened in 1977, she said, there were fewer than 600 students using the center. Now there are double that number.

"You can't double the number of anything and keep the same amount of space," she said.

At a meeting Tuesday, Gerald Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect, said the expansion committee for the center has enough money to begin looking for an architect.

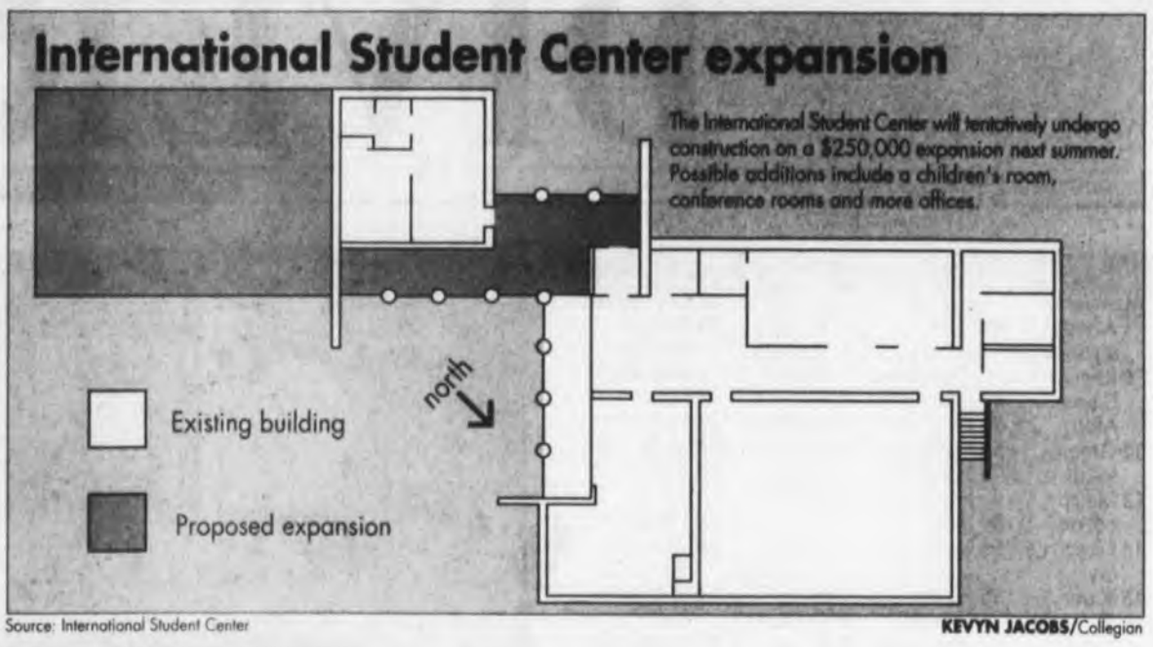
There will be a committee meeting in October to meet and discuss the project with numerous architectural firms. An architect will be chosen sometime after that meeting.

Although the details of the plans for the center won't be stamped out until an architect is chosen, there are plans for a Taiwan Wing and a Korean Room. These spaces are named after countries, groups or organizations, based on the amount of money raised by that group.

To have a wing named after it, a group must raise $100,000 or more.

Different types of rooms can be named, depending on whether they are conference rooms, office rooms, children's rooms or renovations of existing rooms. The price tag of various rooms runs from $30,000 to $50,000.

Donna Davis, director of the center, said ideas the center have generated so far include enclosing the open walkway between the two buildings, and building onto the southern part of the building.



Davis said any ideas the center has are subject to change, depending on the architect's plans for the building.

Joe Tiao, Manhattan resident and former student, has helped the center raise money.

So far, he has helped raise $60,000 for the Taiwan Wing by calling personal contacts.

"I just try my best," he said.

Tiao was a graduate student in computer science at K-State in the 1970s and taught at K-State for 13 years in agricultural economics. He said he thinks it's important to give something back to K-State.

Saddam's troops attack warplanes

SPEED

▶ Two F-16 jet fighters patrolling northern Iraq were fired upon, escalating tensions and bringing an Iraq-U.S. showdown closer to occurring.

▪ Kurdish refugees flee to Iran while Iraq lashes out against U.S. fighters.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SULAYMANIYAH, Iraq — While leaders of a defeated Kurdish faction sought refuge in Iran, Saddam Hussein fired a new challenge at the United States on Wednesday, boldly targeting American warplanes enforcing a no-fly zone.

A missile that was fired at two F-16 jet fighters patrolling northern Iraq missed its target but brought Iraq and the United States closer to another showdown. The United States responded by sending bombers and stealth fighters to the region, suggesting a retaliatory strike was likely.

Refugees fleeing for safety in Iran and Turkey gathered at borders, though only a few were permitted to cross.

Saddam said he would no longer honor the "damned imaginary" no-fly zones last week after U.S. forces blasted air-defense sites in southern Iraq with cruise missiles.

The U.S. strike was an attempt to curb an offensive by Iraq and Kurdish allies against an opposing Kurdish faction in northern Iraq. The Saddam-allied forces prevailed, routing their foes in key cities and sending several thousand fleeing to Turkey and Iran.

In Wednesday's action, Iraqi forces fired one missile at two F-16s over northern Iraq, the Pentagon said. The Iraqi radars tracking the F-16s were not kept on long enough for the jets to fire retaliatory radar-seeking missiles.

"Our air defenses intercepted the enemy targets with anti-aircraft guns and rockets and forced them to flee," the official Iraqi news agency said Wednesday.

Iraq has reported similar actions for several days, but Wednesday was the first time the Americans confirmed coming under fire.

Pentagon officials said two B-52 bombers based in Guam would be relocated to the island of Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean. B-52s fired some of the cruise missiles that struck Iraq last week.

> "Our air defenses intercepted the enemy targets with anti-aircraft guns ... and forced them to flee.
> • OFFICIAL IRAQI NEWS AGENCY

In Washington, Defense Secretary William Perry said F-117 stealth fighters were being sent as well. He declined to say exactly how many of the radar-evading aircraft were sent or where they would be based.

In the past two weeks, Saddam has undertaken his biggest military venture since the end of the Gulf War.

On Aug. 31, Saddam sent troops into the safe haven to help Kurdish allies oust a rival Iranian-backed Kurdish group. He has defied limited U.S. attempts to stop him and now appears willing to provoke a new confrontation.

The Iraqi offensive has sent thousands of refugees fleeing toward Turkey and Iran. Seeking to prevent an exodus, Saddam has declared a general amnesty for all Kurds and lifted travel and trade barriers between Iraq and the Kurdish area.

The U.N. refugee agency said in Sulaymaniyah that 50,000 people had fled the town, drastically lowering Tuesday's estimates of 300,000. About half of them have since returned home, said an official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Some of the refugees in Bashmaq said forces of the Saddam-allied Kurdistan Democratic Party had chased them to the border. Refugees and border guards who refused to give their names said KDP forces opened fire at refugees lined up at the border Tuesday, killing and wounding some.

The rival Patriotic Union of Kurdistan said in a statement Wednesday that four people were killed and 120 injured when KDP fighters fired on refugees at the Iraqi border town of Panjwin.

Iran's official Tehran radio said Wednesday that tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds had entered Iran and that aid workers were struggling to provide food, water and medical care for them in temporary camps along the border.

Disinterest kills Lafene's health bill plan

DARCIE MCCONKEY
staff reporter

The Lafene-Only Health Plan provided by G-M Underwriters Agency, Inc., has been eliminated because of lack of student interest.

This plan, which was one of the three insurance coverage options students could chose from, covered all services at Lafene Health Center. A year after the program was implemented, it became obvious that few students were utilizing the service.

"Lafene wanted to create a bottom-dollar policy for everyone of every status, but when few people took advantage of this opportunity, we decided it was not worth offering," said Sally Sowell, director of administrative services at Lafene.

Lafene director Lannie Zweimiller said he agreed with Sowell.

"The Lafene-Only Plan had cheaper premiums, but with less money, students receive less coverage. This plan was risky because it covered no health services outside of Lafene and limited students' health care. We just did not create enough student interest," Zweimiller said.

G-M Underwriters advised the center to drop the health plan and concentrate on encouraging students to take advantage of the other two insurance options, Zweimiller said.

Students, however, still have the opportunity to join G-M Underwriters' basic and comprehensive plans, which provide patient care at any hospital throughout Kansas, as well as health services at Lafene.

Although G-M Underwriters' current health plan has been well received by the majority of students and the program is specially designed for the students on

Master's degree no longer required for CPA exam

MATT BASLER
staff reporter

The five-year bachelor's-master's degree accounting program will be changed to a 150-hour program.

The College of Business Administration voted Tuesday for the change in response to a state law passed in 1991, Dave Donnelly, department head of accounting, said. The law will go into effect in 1997.

The law requires students who plan to take the Certified Public Accountant exam to have at least 150 hours before they can even sit in on the exam.

"That doesn't necessarily mean that you have to have a master's degree to take the exam. You just need 150 hours," Richard Ott, assistant professor of accounting, said.

Currently, students in accounting are in a program in which they receive their bachelor's degree in four years and then automatically enter a fifth-year master's degree program. The program was changed to a five-year program in 1991 because of new demands in the accounting profession.

However, starting July 1, 1997, the new 150-hour program will take effect, Donnelly said.

The new program makes the master's degree obsolete. Upon completion of 150 hours, an accounting student will be ready to take the CPA examination.

K-State is requiring accounting students to have a 3.0 grade point average to enter the program.

Officials in the College of Business Administration do not want students spending four years in school only to find out they are not being accepted to the graduate program because of low grades.

"We don't want them feeling like they were misled," Donnelly said.

Many students fail to make grades good enough for admittance into the last year and miss their master's degree.

Students who fail to maintain a 2.5 GPA after being admitted will be put on a Denison Hall will be demolished, but more planning is needed first

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The rumors have spread faster than a prairie fire, but Denison Hall will not be torn down during this school year.

Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said although there is a general consensus the building needs to be razed, at this point the administration is only looking at alternatives.

"First, we have to determine suitable, and hopefully better, space for the Department of English to move," Rawson said. "Then we would need to get approval from the Board of Regents and the Legislature."

Rawson said the Dean of Arts and Sciences office would also be included in the decision-making process.

The current rumor roaming campus is for plans to raze the building in the of summer 1997.

"That rumor has been going around," Rawson said. "That would be desirable, but we have a lot of planning to do."

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning, said facilities has had no substantive discussions about razing Denison.

Carter said the Denison project would be conducted similarly to the Art Building demolition.

Students offer sober-driver program

STORY BY BRANDI HERTIG • ILLUSTRATION BY SARA SMITH

Two K-State students are devising a plan to help students who need someone to give them a ride home but don't have a sober companion by their side.

Angie Jensen, senior in textile science, and Scott Phillips, senior in mass communications and public relations, have an idea called SafeRide, a shuttle to take students from one place to their home. It will also function as a service to students who are on campus late at night and need a ride home.

Jensen and Phillips began working on the project together about 1-1/2 years ago. In that time, the two have done extensive research to find the best way to implement the service at K-State.

"I felt it was something K-State needed as a school," Jensen said.

Their research has included inquiring to other schools who already have similar programs in effect, such as the University of Kansas and Emporia State University, and has also extended to schools in Florida that have national programs designed to help programs SafeRide get off the ground.

Phillips pointed out that their research has been two-pronged.

One part of the research deals with making the program accessible to students and creating more student jobs, Phillips said.

Another part has focused on ways to educate people about the program and provide counseling for students who might be problem drinkers.

Finding a way to fund the program has been another challenge for Jensen and Phillips.

They tried to make this a program run by students for students, Jensen said.

To keep the service free for its users, Jensen and Phillips are seeking funding from federal assistance and Aggieville merchants. They are also looking to make SafeRide an actual club on campus to use money from student fees.

They have discussed the ideas with a few Aggieville merchants, and the merchants were all interested in the program, Phillips said.

"If it can just help a few people from getting hurt, it's worth it," Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille, said.

Leetch said SafeRide is a program about which he is definitely willing to educate his customers about.

"I want everyone to have a good time, within reason," he said.

Although K-State could benefit from a program like SafeRide, that doesn't necessarily mean there is a problem with drinking among students, Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education service at Lafene, said.

Arck said the typical K-State student drinks approximately 1-1/2 times a week — a statistic that may be a little bit lower than what some people might guess, he said.

Arck said 86 percent of students nationwide consumed alcohol in the past year.

Students who might be able to benefit from SafeRide are welcoming its presence on the campus.

"It's better than having people getting in wrecks," James Funk, junior in park resource management, said.

Funk said the program is something students would most likely consider because it's free.

Some people usually call cabs, and it's expensive, he said.

Michele McGinn, sophomore in business, said she agrees with Funk that many people drive drunk.

Even if they've only had a couple of beers, they still think they can drive home, she said.

Jensen and Phillips anticipate SafeRide's going into effect sometime between next semester and next fall.

"It's a very worthwhile endeavor and one the campus needs," Arck said.

The catalyst for caring

Angie Jensen and Scott Phillips have conducted an informal poll to decide if there would be a need for a SafeRide program. These are the results.

- 77% of the students between the ages of 18 and 25 said many times they don't have a safe ride home.
- 94% of the students polled have consumed alcohol.
- 78% of the students have ridden home with a driver who has had too much to drink.
- More than 60% of the students have driven home after consuming alcohol.
- About 90% of the students said they would use a SafeRide Program if it were available.

Bands to battle for Opus title

Debbie Hollis
staff reporter

The area's latest sounds will fill the air at 5:30 p.m. Friday in the Union free-speech zone as Opus 10 band competition begins.

Admission is free.

This year, seven bands will compete for the $400 first prize.

"Prize money is totally funded by entry fees," said Doug Lacy, junior in architectural engineering and co-coordinator of Opus 10.

Bands hoping to compete sent in a demo tape with two original songs along with a $40 non-refundable entry fee. Members of Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment Committee reviewed the tapes.

Based on originality, vocal quality and instrument quality, seven finalists and one alternate were selected. This year's alternate will be Llama, a band out of Wichita.

On Friday, each band will play a 20-minute set. A panel of five judges will score the bands on originality, vocal quality, instrument quality, stage presence and audience appeal.

One judge will be a disc jockey from KQLA-FM 103.5. Another judge will be a K-State student.

"The main purpose is to get unsigned bands' names out there," Lacy said.

Last year, 425 Main and Smudge tied for first place in Opus 9.

The next UPC concert will be Muster Plug and Skankin' Pickle at 8 p.m. Oct. 11 at the Wareham Opera House. Admission will be $3.

▶ GRADUATE STUDIES

Rural geography program offered

Chad Helin
staff reporter

K-State has added a new doctoral program.

This fall, the Department of Geography is offering a doctoral program with an emphasis on rural geography. This makes the program different from any other in the state.

"The University of Kansas offers a Ph.D. in geography, which made it a sensitive political issue," said John Harrington Jr., acting head of the geography department.

"However, we think our program is original. We aren't duplicating things," Harrington said.

Sujata De, Jason Holcomb, Rodger Lentz, Brad Rundquist, Tom Schafer and Yongyi Tao are the first group of students seeking a doctorate in geography from K-State.

"The people from Charlotte (N.C.) told me this was one of the best places in the country to come for rural geography," said Lentz, a graduate of the University of North Carolina-Charlotte.

The six students will spend the first year or two doing classwork. Once they complete their coursework, they will have the opportunity to select an area of research for their dissertations.

Because this is the first year of the program, no one has a clear idea of what kind of research the students will pursue.

Global Change in Local Places, a research project in which many geography faculty members are involved, is attempting to measure how southwest Kansas contributes to global climate change.

"I think this is a good example of the types of projects and teamwork that will hopefully spin off interest for the students," Harrington said.

Golf course is just rumor

■ Colbert has no plans to build in city's immediate future.

Jeremy Kelley
staff writer

Here's the rumor: Jim Colbert, longtime K-Stater and professional golfer, plans to build a new golf course in the Manhattan area in the semi-near future. However, Robert Krause, vice president of K-State, said this is a falsehood.

"We have been talking with Jim for two years about the possibilities of putting a new course in the area," Krause said.

"In no way are we going to have a new golf course in Manhattan in the semi-near future."

The alleged fact that Colbert's design company, Colbert Golf Design and Development Inc., Las Vegas, was to build a new course in the city came from an article in the Manhattan Mercury.

The article also gave the projected site for the new course — west of the Farm Bureau building and north of Kimball Avenue. The article also gave the initial cost as $7 million for course design.

"I have heard that even the media are constantly on his (Colbert's) back about the whole situation," Krause said. "It's funny."

Krause said he has talked with Colbert and several others on many occasions about what a new course would do for the city of Manhattan and K-State.

"We have talked a lot about what a new course could do for the educational aspect of the University, but right now we are in the embryonic stages," he said.

Krause also commented on how avid golfers would respond to this rumor.

"This talk of a new course construction has ignited a rampage among everybody. It's unreal," he said.

Furthermore, he said that if, in fact, a new course would eventually be built in the Manhattan area, it would not be for some time.

"Tomorrow (Sept. 12) is my birthday, and I am going to have many more birthdays and be a lot older before Manhattan gets a new course," Krause

Greeks find time for God despite busy schedules

Jann Stough
staff reporter

In the hectic life of a greek, finding time for God can be difficult. The Greek Connection provides a place where greeks can communicate with God and each other.

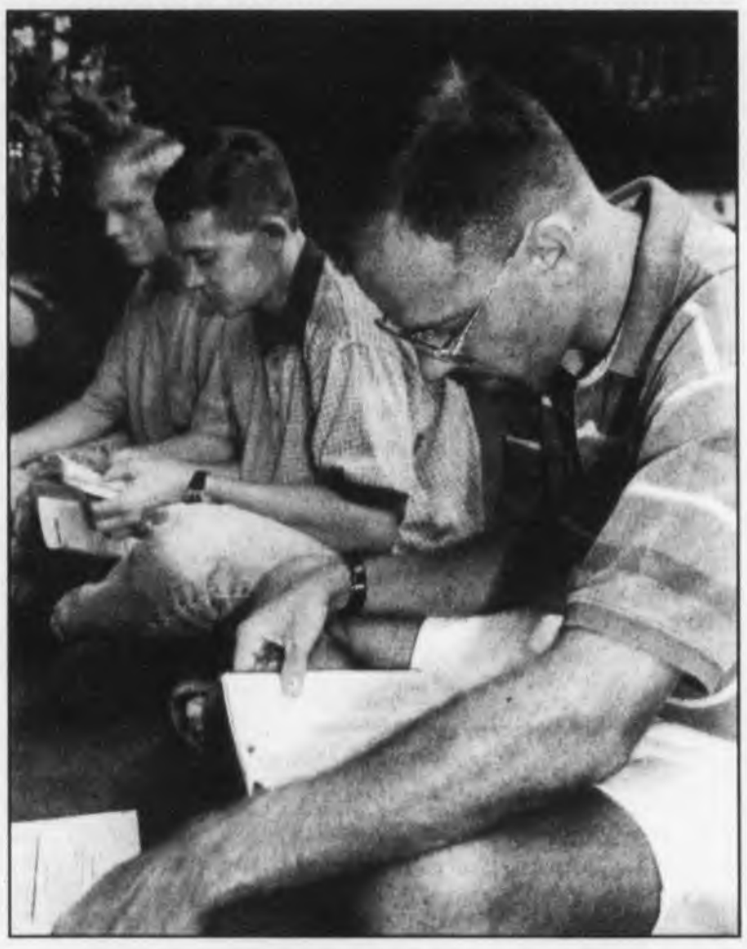
The group meets at 9 p.m. Tuesdays at the Chi Omega house.

"Greeks are busier, and it's a way we can meet late at night to get together so important issues don't get pushed aside," Bob Fine, senior in construction science, said. "I was interested in the Bible and how it applied to my life, and it seemed like a good place to find out."

The group is a branch of K-State's Campus Crusade for Christ. With Campus Crusade for Christ having about 120 members, the Greek Connection gives greeks an opportunity to meet other greeks in a smaller setting. The group averages about 50 students.

"It gives me a chance to meet other greeks on campus that are interested in the same ideals that I have," said Jeff Bullok, senior in mechanical engineering.

Bullok said it's not easy to find other greeks who have his spiritual interests.



The Greek Connection has social parties, tailgate parties and volleyball tournaments throughout the year to build relationships with group members and discuss issues. It is planning a Wildcat Weekend Retreat in late September.

The group takes a laid-back approach to discussing issues, such as AIDS, death, relationships and eternal life, each week.

Last Tuesday, the group discussed relationships and communication between the sexes.

Fine said group members not only sat around and discussed the differences, but they also illustrated them through activities.

In one activity, the group came up with the most common complaints men and women have about each other.

"The women in the group agreed that men don't listen, don't talk, don't share their feelings, and that they state short facts and not emotions," Debbie Rust, senior in early childhood education, said.

"Men agreed that women are too emotional, talk too much, expect too much and think that men should read into things like they do," Fine said.

During the discussion, the girls were more dominant in sharing their ideas.

"It was fun to hear about some of the guys' perspective about us," Rust said.

She said she and Fine, who is her fiancé, now better understand things with which they struggle.

"Bob likes to do other things while talking, while I need eye contact and reassurance," Rust said.

Fine also learned something from the meeting.

"I was making lunch the other day when Debbie called. I was about to continue making lunch when I realized that I shouldn't be doing that. I should be listening to her," Fine said. "I need to devote my time to her when she's sharing and not let my mind wander off to other things."

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.
1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income
The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.
First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with up to $7,124 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.
Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.
Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,500 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call:

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

SafeRide would be helpful for inebriated bar-goers

Life is a good thing and should be preserved whenever possible. Thus, the idea of giving drunk people a ride home is virtuous.

SafeRide is a fine and virtuous idea. It saves lives. It is also a trendy idea that is brought up on an annual basis and forgotten on an annual basis.

WHY WE CARE

SafeRide taking students to and from Aggieville is a good idea. But the cost should be the Aggieville merchants' burden — not students'.

It makes for nice Student Senate campaigns. We think action speaks louder than words.

It should either be done or people should shut up about it.

Perhaps some of the reluctancy to act on this good idea is based on practical problems. How many shuttles, how much gas and how many vomit bags will it take to transport Aggieville home at 2 a.m.? We think it will take a lot.

University of Kansas has a similar service, which it provides for its slushes. The service has cost more than any other campus service KU has and driven the program bankrupt. Perhaps, KU needed the service more than K-State.

We were intelligent enough to centralize our bars and thus, limit transportation needed between watering-holes.

The more profound question is how should we pay for this ride? Some have suggested making it a part of a club so student fees can subsidize this venture. This adds to the financial burdens of students who don't drink. Why should Joe Stuffshirt pay for Jim Juicer's ride home? He shouldn't. So who should pay for this good and moral service?

Aggieville businesses might pick up the torch on this one. SafeRide would be great for Aggieville businesses.

If students didn't have to risk death every time they went to Aggieville, there might be an increase in business. Not to mention, the bars could get a warm, fuzzy feeling knowing that they have done society a favor.

There would be fewer DUIs, fewer accidents, more beer, more shots, better driving and better drinking if Aggieville business would financially back the SafeRide service.

Someone needs to draft a proposal and submit it to Aggieville businesses and, if they have any social conscience, they will provide a service that their patrons definitely need.

United States doesn't have authority to decide what is right in Middle East

MY

Rhett HARTMAN

I read in the Sept. 9 Kansas City Star that the recent Iraqi military uprising could have been partially in self-defense. It seems that Iraq was the target of a six-year, $20 million CIA effort to remove Saddam Hussein from power.

With force.

Last time I checked, the Gulf War was finished, so why are we still messing with Hussein? It would seem that the United States just can't sit still when it's challenged in the global arena. Our government seems to like to play the conquistador for underprivileged groups.

Our government decided that they are wrong, and we are right. But even if Hussein is a dictator, can we decide who should live, and who should die?

Or are we just acting in self-defense? Is Hussein still a threat? I can't make that decision, but our government should set some priorities. If we are justified to going into foreign situations and pass judgment, where is our authority coming from?

If we can determine what is right and what is wrong in another culture, then are other cultures able to do the same?

Unless our government's actions are different from its beliefs, it would seem that our government thinks it's appropriate that one person can rule on another without his consent. Does this sound anything like democracy?

What if Hussein doesn't like what you or I or our government are doing? Does he have the right to send his secret agents with their $20 million to remove us from power?

But perhaps I am overreacting. I mean, why would grown women and men who are educated individuals decide to act so childishly?

Let's take a look at the past.

In the past, our government has done stupid things, such as setting up concentration camps for Asian-Americans during World War II because of the same ignorance.

And what about the treaties signed with the Native Americans? How good was our word back then? Why should anyone trust us?

And let's go back even further, back to Plymouth Rock, where Puritans moved to America to practice religious freedom but ended up practicing witch hunts.

The list goes on.

The point is that these situations have forced our government into a position of authority, which is not natural. Authority is given, not taken. Who has given the United States the authority to use force to remove foreign powers from their authority?

Well, one excuse is that, if we don't do anything, Hussein will start to take over whatever countries he would like to, and he might not stop. By that time, it would be too late to do anything, so why not just nip it in the bud?

This is sort of a Vietnam War excuse, but logical. The problem is, this answer responds to a symptom and not the actual problem.

The reason Hussein is in power is because he was rich enough to buy enough weapons, and he killed whomever was against him.

This wouldn't get you far in America (i.e. — Montana militia, Davidians). But Iraq is still sort of in the Middle Ages when it comes to defending against dictators.

This is not a fault, but merely a characteristic of that culture. In a feudal sort of way, a person like Hussein who can amass an army, can control the government.

But military force is special.

It's special because you don't need any forethought to gain it or use it. You only need money. This will be both Hussein's and our government's downfall, if they keep relying on armed force.

So what is the problem that must be addressed?

When people from our University get degrees and go into positions of power, what is it that they should learn from this disaster?

The problem at hand is that the world has grown too fast for its own good. Too many people can buy too many guns — Iraq and the United States included. ValuJet has shown us the cost of growing too fast for our own good.

I think it will take a long time for the United States to solve this problem. Imagine our political system as one of sound bites and political planks.

As of now, there is little room for change and no room for slowing growth. This gives almost no room for forethought (even though it does happen).

When I get married and have a child, I hope my son or daughter lives somewhere that values acceptance along with competition.

I hope we live in a culture that can see beyond the temporary impetus of money.

I hope we will pay more attention to our children than our armies.

Whatever you think of me, I love my country

MY

Erin MANSUR-SMITH

patriot — n. one who loves, supports and defends one's country — Webster's II New Riverside University Dictionary

I am a patriot.

This might seem like a strange way to begin a column but I think there are many people who have been wondering about this. (I am sure there will be many more who will question it after they're done reading this column.)

People who know me and have seen me have massive temper fits over the government, its policies and its elected officials might be surprised by that statement.

Others, who don't know me, but have read my columns during the last four years, might think because I have protested the Gulf War and our involvement in Somalia and Rwanda, I am being a hypocrite by calling myself a supporter of my country.

These are the times that remind us all of how we really feel about patriotism and what we really believe in. I, myself, have thought long and hard about what being a patriot means. It has become quite an issue.

After all, how can I call myself a patriot when I think the U.S. government does many of the things we only think other countries do, including violating the rights of people it insists are citizens and yet are not treated equally under the law?

How can I say I am a patriot when I refuse to say the Pledge of Allegiance or advocate an amendment outlawing flag burning?

How can I consider myself a patriot when I believe in the Equal Rights Amendment and think Bob Dole would make a better potted plant than a president?

As a resident of conservative Kansas, in the heart of Dole country, many of you might feel any one of these beliefs should see me shipped off to some communist bloc country or to the latest frontline.

Many of you might be calling me 10 different nasty names, none of them having anything to do with the word patriot.

But no matter what you might think or say, I am a patriot in my own way.

For many years, I have listened to people tell me that to be a patriot means to have the same kind of America: right or wrong mentality I saw defended rabidly during the Gulf War. People were so afraid of being perceived as unsympathetic toward the troops we sent over there, they were almost afraid to say "I disagree with the reasons we are sending them."

People are so wrapped up in the symbols that come with the words family, God and country, especially in the Midwest, that anyone who contests the use of some symbols or questions their deeper meaning, is seen as disrespecting what they stand for.

Or if anyone argues that not everyone in this country is being represented equally or protests they aren't being protected under the law of the land as equitably as everyone else, they are perceived as being ungrateful for the privilege of their citizenship.

On the other end of the spectrum, there are some of us who are afraid to say they love their country because they feel as if they have to believe in and embrace everything it has done in order to do so.

They believe saying they love the principles under which it was founded means they are supporting all of the policies their government advocates.

I love my country. This is my home, but I do not love or support or defend everything its government or its society does, including most of its military policies.

I am a patriot because I do not want to see this country's history marked by war every 20 to 25 years because we need to boost our economy. Or to see resources go to other countries that could have been used to save the masses of our own.

I am a patriot, and I do not want to send troops against Iraq to defend countries in the Middle East when we will not do the same for pro-democracy students in China or indigenous people in the Americas.

I do not want to hear that there is not a race problem in this country, but that there is a problem in Bosnia that must be attended to for the sake of the whole world.

That does not mean I do not support the people who carry out the orders of the government my vote shapes. Whatever they do is as much my responsibility as anyone who is of voting age. I just want them home, and I want home to be for everyone what it is for a few.

I believe in democracy, and I would die for it, but I do not believe it is the perfect system for everyone everywhere. That is for them to decide, and I do not believe to demonstrate my love and loyalty for those principles so many have died for, and my country has to kill for it.

If you do, that is your right. But do not tell me and others like me that we don't care just as much about this country as you do or love it any less.

I just want to see it grow into its own creed and fulfill its promises right here first before helping the whole world.

Media are not being fair

Editor,

Once again the press is jumping to conclusions as to the integrity of someone associated with the sports world. Just because all the facts aren't known or are not available to the public at this time, doesn't necessarily mean that Coach Stoops and Coach Snyder are covering something up.

Maybe there are or is an extenuating circumstance in this case.

Now before anyone jumps to conclusions about me, let me go on the record for saying that I'm not saying they are covering something up, and I'm not saying they aren't. I also feel that what he did was wrong (getting behind the wheel after drinking), but there is a large population out there that has done the same thing — right or wrong, it happens.

What I am saying is that before you, or anyone else, passes judgment on someone else for their wrong doing, make sure you have the facts first. Unless someone on your editorial board is a law enforcement officer or a passenger in Coach Stoop's vehicle, you don't know the whole story. So hold off on your judgments until every fact in this case is known for certain.

Honor comes from within

Editor,

After reading Keely Schields column in Tuesday's Collegian, I debated with myself about responding to it. I lost.

So here it is.

As I read her words, the premise is that if one could end bubble-sheet testing here at K-State, there would be less cheating. An additional premise is that there is no honor in this sort of testing, and that it doesn't encourage understanding, but rather encourages cheating.

May I suggest to you that this argument is just another version of the recent trend toward finding someone else to blame when you make a mistake.

Honor comes from inside. The type of test, and, indeed, the quality of the instruction, have no relevance. If you want to learn, you will learn. If you want to cheat, you will cheat. Cheaters are not victims of instructors, or of bubble tests.

They make a choice to cheat, and they alone are responsible for that choice.

Ms. Schields has unthinkingly insulted thousands of dedicated, overworked and underpaid instructors at this institution by suggesting that we are culpable when a student chooses to cheat.

We are not. And the fact that she made that suggestion in a public forum only makes our jobs that much harder, because now the cheaters have more ammunition for their specious "I am a victim of the system" argument. Thanks a lot.

2nd Haynes salon will open on west side

ASHLEY WEEKLY
staff reporter

Haynes Style Shop and Beauty Supply in Aggieville will be opening another store later this month on the west side of town.

"I love Aggieville, but we are out of room in our current store. Clients also wanted a store on the west side of town," Kathi Haynes, store owner, said.

The new store, south of the Westloop Dillons, will have more room and style stations than the original Haynes.

"A few employees from Aggieville are transferring to the new store. The others are people coming from other salons in and out of Manhattan," Haynes said.

Haynes West will feature several additions to the original store.

"We are adding all kinds of services for our customers," he said.

"Education, wellness, aromatherapy, massage therapy and cancer-patient services will be offered in our new store."

The Haynes family has been in the hair-cutting business in Manhattan for 72 years.

Ira Haynes Sr. moved to Manhattan in 1924.

After working in Aggieville, Ira Haynes Sr. moved to the College Canteen, a barbershop in the basement of Anderson Hall.

After the State Board of Administration ordered the barbershop to be discontinued, Haynes Sr. moved back to Aggieville in 1928.

Ira Haynes Sr. helped open and operate Varsity Barber Shop, which was in the current Haynes building.

He worked there until his retirement in 1976.

Ira Haynes Jr. and his wife, Kathi, took over Varsity when his father retired. The salon's name was changed to Haynes in the early 1980s.

Ira Haynes Jr. has been in the salon business for more than 25 years.

With the opening of another store, Ira Haynes Jr. said he feels they have accomplished a lot of goals.

He said these goals were achieved because the business operates as a family.

Equine race needs volunteers

DAVE KATZER
staff reporter

Through the fog of the early morning, horse and rider begin to emerge. It's race day at the World Championship for Equine Endurance. The rider takes a dripping sponge from a nearby volunteer and, after thanking the person, cools the mount. The equestrian duo gallops toward the horizon.

K-State students have the opportunity to volunteer handing out wet sponges or any number of things, at the 1996 World Championship Equine Endurance race. The event will be Sept. 21, at the Rock Springs 4-H Center south of Junction City. There are many jobs for local and regional volunteers, Jerry Gillespie, chairman of the Organizing Committee, said.

"There is a wide variety of things to do, from putting up stables and helping with timing, to serving as interpreters for the foreign competitors," Gillespie said.

There is no formal volunteer registration required. Gillespie said just stopping in at the volunteer headquarters at Rock Springs is sufficient.

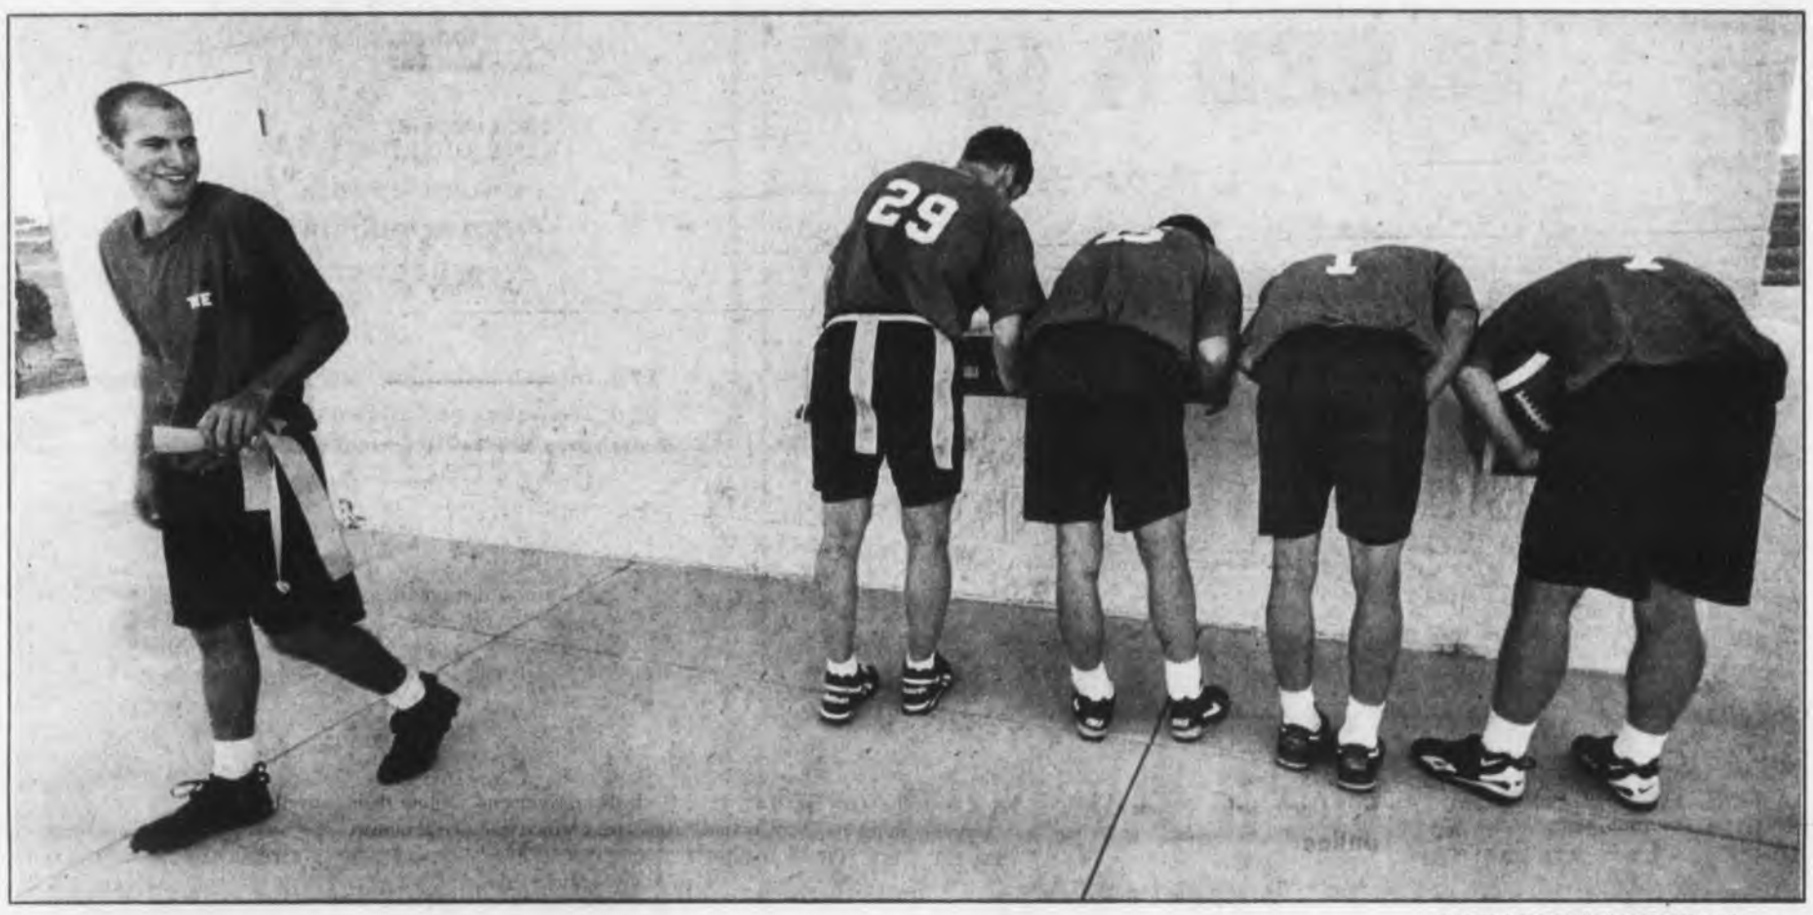
"People can stop by the volunteer center, and we'll send them to help out wherever they are needed," Gillespie said.

"We need people beginning this Saturday at 8 a.m. to finish up the final preparations, such as stable construction. But we will need volunteers from Saturday (Sept. 14) morning through Sunday (Sept. 22) night."

The committee has already signed up more than 600 volunteers for the event, but more are needed. Margie Burton, volunteer coordinator, said the more hands there are helping, the quicker things will get done.

"We really can't have too many people. We've got a huge job coming up this weekend before the ride, so we need lots of help. We need anybody who wants to volunteer," Burton said.

For More Information
Contact Jerry Gillespie at 532-4258.



In exchange for donating their time, volunteers will be a part of a world-class championship event and have the opportunity to make friends from other countries.

"This is an international event we're preparing for. Being involved in a world championship with over 20 countries will give a sense of pride to the volunteers, because they helped the state of Kansas put on the best championship in the world for this event," Burton said.

"This is a great experience for people to mix with the foreign competitors. They are very enthusiastic, up-beat people. Volunteers will have a chance to make some friends and to see some of the premier athletes and horses from around the world," Gillespie said.

Volunteers won't be expected to just work at the event.

Burton said volunteers will usually work in two- to four-hour shifts and have at least half the day to take in the sights of the competition. Included in the five-day event is the High Plains Art Festival, American Horse Festival, a trade show and the race itself.

Tau Kappa Epsilon looking for repeat title

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

Football has once again begun here at K-State.

Flag football, that is.

The intramural flag football season has begun at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Once again, Tau Kappa Epsilon is at the top of the charts in the men's preseason rankings.

The Gators lead the women's division, while the Pink Tacos are at the top spot in the co-rec division.

Preseason rankings are based on a number of things.

"One major thing we look at is last season's performance, especially for the preseason rankings," Ron Miller, associate director of intramurals, said.

ROB RANEY, senior in mechanical engineering, tries to avoid having his flag pulled by some Beta Sigma Psi opponents. Raney and the rest of his Tau Kappa Epsilon teammates are starting out the season as the top intramural flag football teams.

"We also get the supervisors' help to look at the rosters, who is or isn't returning from last year's squads," Miller said.

The TKE's will be looking for a repeat this year in the men's division. Last year, they captured the all-university championship. Some expect another repeat from the TKEs.

> "We got a lot of freshmen on the team that are trying to learn the concepts of flag football. We are a little worried about the new guys knowing a lot of the plays."
> • CESAR VALLE
> ACACIA PLAYER

"They are going to be tough to beat, They have a lot of guys back this year," Steve Martini, director of intramurals, said.

TKE player Bill Jacob said the team's unity is its strength.

"We have the same guys playing, and we are all used to each other," Jacob said. "Since we are used to playing with each other, we have the ability to run different plays of set ones."

TKE's biggest challenge could come from Acacia.

Acacia is ranked No. 2 in the preseason rankings and defeated TKE in a scrimmage earlier in the semester.

"Acacia looked really good. They will be tough to beat," Jacob said.

Unlike TKE, Acacia doesn't have a majority of last year's team returning.

Acacia player Cesar Valle said that is a significant concern for the team this year.

"We got a lot of freshmen on the team that are trying to learn the concepts of flag football," Valle said. "We are a little worried about the new guys knowing a lot of the plays."

But Valle said these first couple of games will be a good tune-up for the team.

"The first two games shouldn't give us too much trouble, so that will give these new guys some good experience," Valle said.

Wildcats begin season with rocky start, injured player

SHANE MCCORMICK
contributing writer

The K-State women's golf team began its fall season at the Chip-N Invitational last weekend at Firethorn Golf Club, in Lincoln, Neb.

The team finished in 10th place at the tournament, just eight strokes behind fellow Big 12 opponent Iowa State.

"I was a little disappointed in our performance," Coach Kristi Knight said.

"We got off to a decent start, but we struggled in the final round."

The Cats were forced to play most of the tournament without one of their top players.

Desiree Simmons was forced to pull out of the tournament after just one round of play. During the qualifying round, Simmons began to notice swelling in her elbow.

She played through the pain in the first round, but it took its toll.

"After the first nine holes, I was really hurting," Simmons said. "By the time I got to the 14th hole, I could barely swing the club."

Knight said the injury was a big loss to the team.

> That course is difficult. You have to make a lot of precise shots. Carrie is going to be a great player.
> • DESIREE SIMMONS
> K-STATE GOLFER

Sophomore Ann Slater finished the tournament tied for 22nd. Slater posted a 78 in her second round.

"She posted some high scores on the back nine throughout the rounds. That brought her score up a little bit," Knight said. "She's a hard worker. She puts a lot of effort into her game. I think she just got a little bit frustrated."

"It was really too bad. She played well in the qualifying round," she said. "Desiree is someone I expect to be in the top five on the team and be a regular traveler."

Despite Simmons' injury, other individuals showed some good performances in their first tournament of the year.

Making her collegiate debut in Lincoln was freshman Carrie Chambers. She tied for 24th in the tournament. Her low round was also in the second round, where she posted a score of 80.

"I wasn't too happy with my performance versus expecting lower scores," Chambers said. "But I was extremely nervous, and the course was playing difficult."

Although Chambers wasn't pleased with her performance, she drew rave reviews from her coach and teammates.

"I was very pleased with Carrie," Knight said. "She had a few bad holes, but she didn't go off the deep end. She made the most of it."

"I thought Carrie did very well for her first tournament," Simmons said. "That course is difficult. You have to make a lot of precise shots. Carrie is going to be a great player."

The next action for the Cats will be Sept. 21 when they travel to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to play in the Northern Iowa Invitational.

"As a team, we need to work on course management and work on our decision-making skills before then," Knight said.

Women's teams want to increase fan attendance at home games

At a meeting Monday night, K-State women's basketball coach Debbie Patterson said she'll do whatever it takes.

"I'll go anywhere. I'll take my team anywhere. I can be crazy. I can be sophisticated," she said.

Patterson was referring to one of her primary goals for the development of K-State women's basketball — increasing student attendance at games.

The meeting, called by Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, queried student leaders on ways to increase attendance at women's basketball games.

Women's basketball has a grand tradition at K-State, but student turnout has been notable for its absence. True, a winning program is the surest way to attract fans, and it's been some time since the Wildcats have had an impressive season.

But the Cats have played big games, and they've played many of them close enough that solid fan support might have turned the tide.

Former coach Brian Agler began the revival of K-State women's basketball three years ago. The Cats' home win over No. 15 Kansas Feb. 12, 1995, was probably K-State's biggest win in the 1990s.

But the fans were there at that game — more than 3,000 of them (although more than a few wore the Jayhawks' crimson and blue).

Two weeks later, the Cats were host to No. 3 Colorado (the only Big 8 school K-State did not defeat in the Agler era) and lost 77-74 when a last-second three-point attempt rimmed out. Barely 1,000 fans watched that game.

Patterson doesn't want that to happen again.

"I wish I could take you to the games we'll play in Austin (Texas) and Lubbock (Texas) and Boulder (Colorado) and Lawrence," she said. "Those gyms will rock. They'll have thousands of screaming, stomping, cheering fans.

"I want Bramlage to be like that. I want to fill Bramlage gym to the gills for women's basketball."

The importance of bringing in fans is not lost on volleyball coach Jim Moore.

"That's one big goal of mine is to get attendance up at games," he said.

While both Patterson and Moore acknowledge the key to attracting fans is putting a quality product on the floor, both also know they are fighting the impression that their sports are secondary.

> Those gyms will rock. They'll have thousands of screaming, stomping cheering fans. I want Bramlage to be like that.

> • DEBBIE PATTERSON
> WOMEN'S BASKETBALL COACH

"I do believe this is a great spectator sport," Moore said, "and if we get people there once, they will come back."

Attendance at K-State volleyball matches has gone up since Moore arrived, with two matches last season (a win over Colorado and a loss to No. 1 Nebraska) setting K-State records.

"You just don't understand what that does for the team," Moore said. "That's a fact. When the people come out, when the students come out, it makes a huge difference in how our players feel.

"This is a women's sport, and for such a long period of time, women's sports were viewed as secondary to the men's sports. When the fans come to the games, and they're cheering for you, you don't feel like you're the secondary sport anymore. And that means a lot to them."

Moore will get his chance to bring out the fans long before Patterson does.

K-State's home volleyball season opens tomorrow with the Kansas State Wildcat Classic. The Cats will play the University of Missouri-Kansas City, South Carolina and Eastern Michigan.

But both teams need student support.

Wildcat fans who can't wait for the football game Saturday can find an outlet for their spirit Friday in Ahearn Field House.

And come November, I want to see Bramlage Coliseum rockin' for the Cats.

P.S. Let's make Bramlage rock for both Debbie Patterson's Wildcats and Tom Asbury's. We have two great head basketball coaches at K-State — let's keep it that way.

Take a vacation to Disneyland on the Internet

website review

Every week, Darin Siefkes, senior in history, will review various sites on the World Wide Web in this space.

Do you know an interesting site, have a question or want to comment?

E-mail Siefkes at wings@ksu.ksu.edu.

The semester has started to kick into full gear, and I'm already yearning to return to the summer and take another vacation. It's not going to happen, but I can take a vacation online.

Donald Laird's Virtual Disneyland Tour!
(http://www.donaldlaird.com/personal/disney/virtual/)

If you have been to Disneyland, ever thought about going to Disneyland, or would just like to waste hours looking at a really cool homepage, this is the site for you.

This page is made by a web designer in California who is a big fan of the fun park.

What he has done is compile the hundreds of pictures that he took throughout the years and put them together to make it possible to walk through Disneyland from the comfort of your own home.

There are over a hundred pictures in this page.

It gives surfers a great feel of the park.

Surfers can easily lose themselves just wandering around this virtual park, or click on the compass symbol at the bottom of the page to view a map that will transport them anywhere in the park instantly. (Wouldn't it be cool if they could do that at the real Disneyland?)

The only thing that I could find wrong with this page is the graphics are large, but so is the park.

A 14.4k modem will easily be fast enough to make viewing quick enough to be worthwhile.

NPS—Golden Gate NRA—Alcatraz
(http://www.nps.gov/alcatraz/)

While we're in California, it's always cool to visit this country's most infamous island.

The National Park Service has developed this page to explore Alcatraz island from the inside out.

I'm sure Al Capone is rolling around in his grave with Alcatraz's new logo: "Golden Gate National Recreation Area," because I'm sure it wasn't much of a recreation area for him.

The history of not only the prison, but the fort that predated it and the Native Americans take-over of it that post dated the prison; are all documented in this very interesting web site.

There is a bookstore here as well to allow users to find books about "The Rock."

I also recommend visiting their links page which has several unusual links that are interesting.

My biggest complaint is that there are not nearly enough pictures of the prison and the former fort.

The tour is good, but the prison is glossed over too quickly for my taste.

MSI — U-505 Type-IXc U—boat
(http://www.msichicago.org/exhibit/U505/U505home.html)

Ever wonder what it would be like to tour the world underneath the ocean?

This page will, answer your questions as it shows you the U-505 up close and personal.

This submarine that is famous for hunting in wolfpacks will give renewed respect for what the Nazi sailor had to live through during the Second World War.

The page gives a complete history of the sub from its building to current status as a museum.

However, the tour is what this page should be visited for. Pictures of the entire sub, along with descriptions of what her crew had to endure make visiting this page worth it.

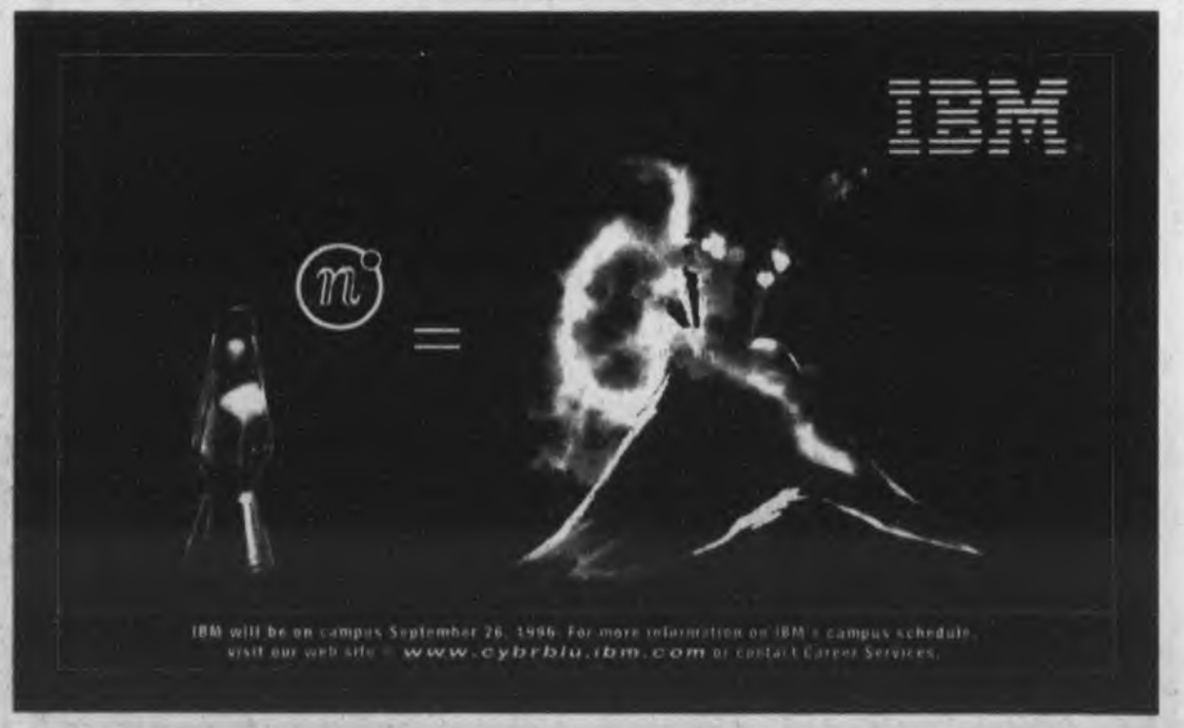
Guardian's Egypt — Main Gate
(http://pages.prodigy.com/G/U/N/guardian/egypt.htm)

Our last stop takes us on the complete flip side of the world to see the longest existing civilization in the history of humankind.

They have taken the dry subject of ancient history and made it very interesting.

It is very cool how the page automatically will submit your name to be turned to hieroglyphs for fun.

The page also contains really cool information on what is happening with Ramsey II children.



This page is mainly a links page to nearly everything there is in relation to Egypt, both ancient and modern, so check it out.

New lot helps Rec handle crowds

JESS C. LOUK
staff reporter

The parking lot just west of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex has 275 new parking stalls.

With the addition of the lot, the Rec Complex has 547 stalls available.

The lot cost the Rec Complex and Parking Services $330,000 to build. The cost of the project was split evenly between the two agencies.

Parking Services will keep the money generated from tickets distributed in the lot.

The money will then be allocated to a general parking-lot fund used for the upkeep of parking lots on campus.

The lot is the final step in the renovation of the Rec Complex.

"Before, it was dirt over there, and people parked anyway but loose," Raydon Robel, director of Recreation Services, said.

The additional lot will not offer any new metered stalls for students without parking permits. Parking Services has 50 metered stalls available at the Rec Complex.

Parking services generates an average of $350 per week from the 25-30 tickets given at the meters, David Armaro, assistant director of parking, said.

The additional lot will allow the Rec Complex to handle the steady stream of cars during its peak periods.

The Rec Complex handles an average of 1,743 people a day. Sixty percent of those people come between 4 and 9 p.m., Derek Walters, assistant recreation director, said.

"Parking was pretty bad at night. The front lot is full by 4:30. This lot is going to be just great," Robin Quinn, assistant recreation director, said.

Tutoring help is available for students

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

Students needing help with academics can find tutoring services at no cost.

The tutoring center is in Leasure 201.

Tutoring services at K-State are open to all undergraduate students for K-State courses only.

Anna Marcotte, tutoring center office staff, said students just need to stop by and fill out an application.

The application is then either sent to Holton Hall, or it stays in Leasure.

Cathy Blair, tutoring coordinator, said some of the applications will be sent to Holton, which also has a tutoring center.

"It just depends whether it is funded by the state or Kansas of by K-State," Alyssa France, tutoring center office staff, said.

"They will get tutoring either here or at Holton Hall," Marcotte said.

The tutors are students hired to tutor other students in specific subjects. They filled out applications and were interviewed by Blair for the job.

The student is assigned a tutor based on availability and the student's schedule.

"They will get tutored if there is a tutor for that subject and it fits into their schedule," Marcotte said.

Tutoring is available to students in a variety of subjects.

"Most of our subjects are math, physics, chemistry and foreign languages, but we also have political science, statistics, civil engineering, mechanical engineering and some of those kinds of classes," Marcotte said.

The most popular subjects for tutoring are math classes, along with physics and chemistry classes.

Linear fees help, hurt those with off-campus classes

HEATHER HOLLINGSWORTH
contributing writer

This is the fourth story in a five-part series.

Non-traditional students and students taking off-campus classes might have noticed reductions in their tuition bill.

In addition to taking courses through K-State, students have the option of taking classes through Fort Riley, TELENET and area community colleges.

These educational alternatives were often costly with flat fees.

"There were more students that were interested in taking courses through non-traditional means," Tom Schellhardt, K-State associate vice president, said, "but it was difficult for some students to make that jump — taking courses at the community colleges and taking courses here — because we had two different tuition assessments."

Under the old system, a student enrolled in seven hours at K-State would pay full fees here.

If a student was enrolled in a community-college course, it would mean that student would also pay the community college's tuition and fees.

Linear tuition promises to correct problems like this.

"Linear tuition is what I call seamless," Schellhardt said.

This seamless quality means students are not being charged twice, an issue that frequently popped up with flat fees.

"It is a more equitable pricing structure," Schellhardt said. "An individual pays for what they take."

When K-State merged with Salina in 1991, the administration predicted the number of students in the old situation would only escalate.

"When we merged with Salina, we realized there were students in Salina that would want to take courses here and vice versa," Schellhardt said.

The old system was a post-World War II method of accessing tuition. Charging full-time at seven hours appears to have gained its roots about 30 years ago, when most students took 12-15 hours, said John Struve, budget director.

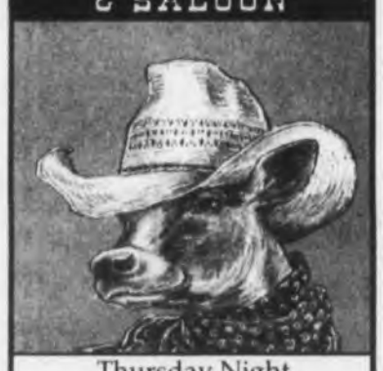
"I don't know if it is out of convenience or what, but there just weren't that many people taking between seven and 12 hours then," Struve said. "It was probably an appropriate way of pricing tuition back then, but it isn't now."

Not all students taking non-traditional classes benefited from the change. The new system has taken away other benefits.

Prior to fall 1996, full-time students — those taking seven or more hours — could receive fee waivers for most Fort Riley courses, said Eric Hander, receptionist at Continuing Education.

Now students must pay $85 per credit hour for Fort Riley courses.

Justin Leeper, junior in finance, is taking nine hours at K-State and six hours at Fort Riley.



Last semester he would have paid $1,100 for K-State tuition and fees. Most likely, he would have then received a fee waiver for his Fort Riley courses.

This semester Leeper paid $759 in K-State tuition and fees and $510 for his Fort Riley courses, which brought his grand total up to $1,600 — a $510 increase.

the Manhattan campus, the student health plan should be reviewed and evaluated every year, said Amy Donahy, Student Health Advisory Committee chair.

"We are not dissatisfied with the current plan, but we feel it is good to keep the selection competitive. We want an insurance company to provide the most benefits with lower costs to the students," Donahy said.

Katie Kimball, the current secretary of the advisory committee, is the only member of the committee who was present when the G-M Underwriters' plan was approved by Student Senate in 1995.

"G-M Underwriters had already been chosen to represent students at Kansas University and proved that they were willing to work hard for K-State. They designed a special program exclusively for the students of our campus," Kimball said.

The response to this program has been very favorable, according to Kimball, but it is important the committee has the opportunity to investigate other insurance options. If another insurance company is chosen to represent K-State, the plan will not be implemented until the 1997-98 school year.

"There's a lot of process that has to occur that I haven't done, like cost-estimating and space planning, before we can proceed," he said.

It's no small secret, however, that on the miniature-scaled, wall model of campus in the facilities conference room, Denison Hall is removable.

Larry Rodgers, head of the English department, said the English department has been promised better space than Denison Hall and that the whole department will be housed together.

"They've assured us we will have a new location and new digs when they tear it (Denison) down," Rodgers said.

One of the rumors circulating recently is the English department would be housed in trailers in a campus parking lot.

"I think the way to treat this is to suggest there are a lot of rumors, and only four people know exactly what's true," Rodgers said.

Rodgers said if you don't hear about it from the President's or Rawson's office, then it is probably unfounded.

Iraq fires on U.S. F-16s

SPEEDREAD

▶ As the Iraq-U.S. conflict continues to escalate, Iraqi official views Kuwaiti involvement as an act of war against the Iraqi state.

▪ Iraq, U.S. edge closer to large-scale conflict in the Persian Gulf.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq and the United States moved closer to a showdown Thursday, with more U.S. firepower sent to the Persian Gulf, Iraq claiming missile attacks on American jets and both countries spitting harsh rhetoric.

After almost two weeks of conflict, each side seemed willing to raise the stakes, but neither looked prepared to make a decisive move.

Iraq said it fired missiles at U.S. warplanes over a no-fly zone for the second straight day Thursday, hours after accusing Kuwait of an act of war for agreeing to open its airfields to American jets.

Pentagon officials confirmed that Iraq fired three surface-to-air missiles Thursday but said they were aimed at an area near the southern no-fly zone where allied aircraft were not flying.

"We had nothing in the area. Clearly, he released them only to make a statement," a military official said on condition of anonymity. There were no (radar) tracks, indicating guidance systems were not left on long enough to direct the missiles to an intended target.

"It took a hard search to find them," the official said.

For days, Iraq has reported firing on U.S. and allied aircraft in the no-fly zones in the north and south. The only other confirmed attack came Wednesday, when Iraqi forces fired a missile at two F-16s in the northern no-fly zone. That missile missed its target.

The United States responded by sending four B-52 bombers and eight F-117 fighter planes to fortify the some 200 aircraft in the region. The Pentagon also said a second aircraft carrier, the USS Enterprise, will join the USS Carl Vinson already in the Gulf.

Kuwait agreed to let the United States base some of the American jets on its territory, a move Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz called a flagrant act of aggression against the people of Iraq and an act of war against the Iraqi state.

Asbury a step closer to leaving K-State

SHANA NEWELL

K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury concluded the interview process for the vacant coaching position at California Thursday.

Asbury was the last of three candidates interviewed this week to fill the opening created by the Aug. 28 resignation of Todd Bozeman.

Eastern Michigan coach Ben Braun visited the Berkeley campus Tuesday. Wednesday, Indiana State coach Sherm Dillard met with school officials.

Cal athletic director John Kasser has said he wants to make a decision by Saturday, but indications from the Bears' athletic department show that an announcement might not come until Monday.

Asbury

Sources close to the Cal athletic department indicate the choice has been narrowed to Braun and Asbury. Dillard is viewed as the third choice.

▶ LAW CHANGES

Penalties rise for fake-ID possession

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

The fake ID game is a dangerous one. Increasing penalties have more than doubled the risk involved.

As of July 1, the possession or display of a fraudulent driver's license is considered a felony. Recent amendments to state laws concerning use of fake IDs have bumped up consequences in several situations.

For example, using another person's driver's license or letting someone use your license has changed from a class B misdemeanor to a class A misdemeanor.

Inside

The recent change in the laws concerning fake IDs has other repercussions for society and college students. The editorial board proposes a solution to the college drinking dilemma.

● Page 4

The monetary penalty for a class A misdemeanor is up to $2,500 and punishable by up to one year in a county jail. A class B misdemeanor, however, has penalties of up to $1,000 in fines and six months jail time.

Reproducing any driver's license by means of photography or duplication and using it as your own is also now considered a class A misdemeanor.

Mike Kearns, assistant Riley County attorney, said the penalty for using a fake ID to obtain alcohol or cereal malt beverage was added to the list of class A misdemeanors but was kept from becoming a felony.

"I think the Legislature was making a policy decision here, that we don't want young people drinking, but we don't want to crucify them with a felony," he said.

If someone has a fake ID, the use of it in any situation, other than the purpose of buying alcohol, will result in a felony charge.

The result of having a canceled, revoked, suspended, fake or altered driver's license in your possession is a severity level nine, nonperson felony.

Depending on the existence of a criminal record for someone charged with such a felony, incarceration possibilities range from five to 17 months.

Kearns said the Alcoholic Beverage Control catches a lot of students with fake IDs.

"Bar men will spot a fake ID in a heartbeat," he said.

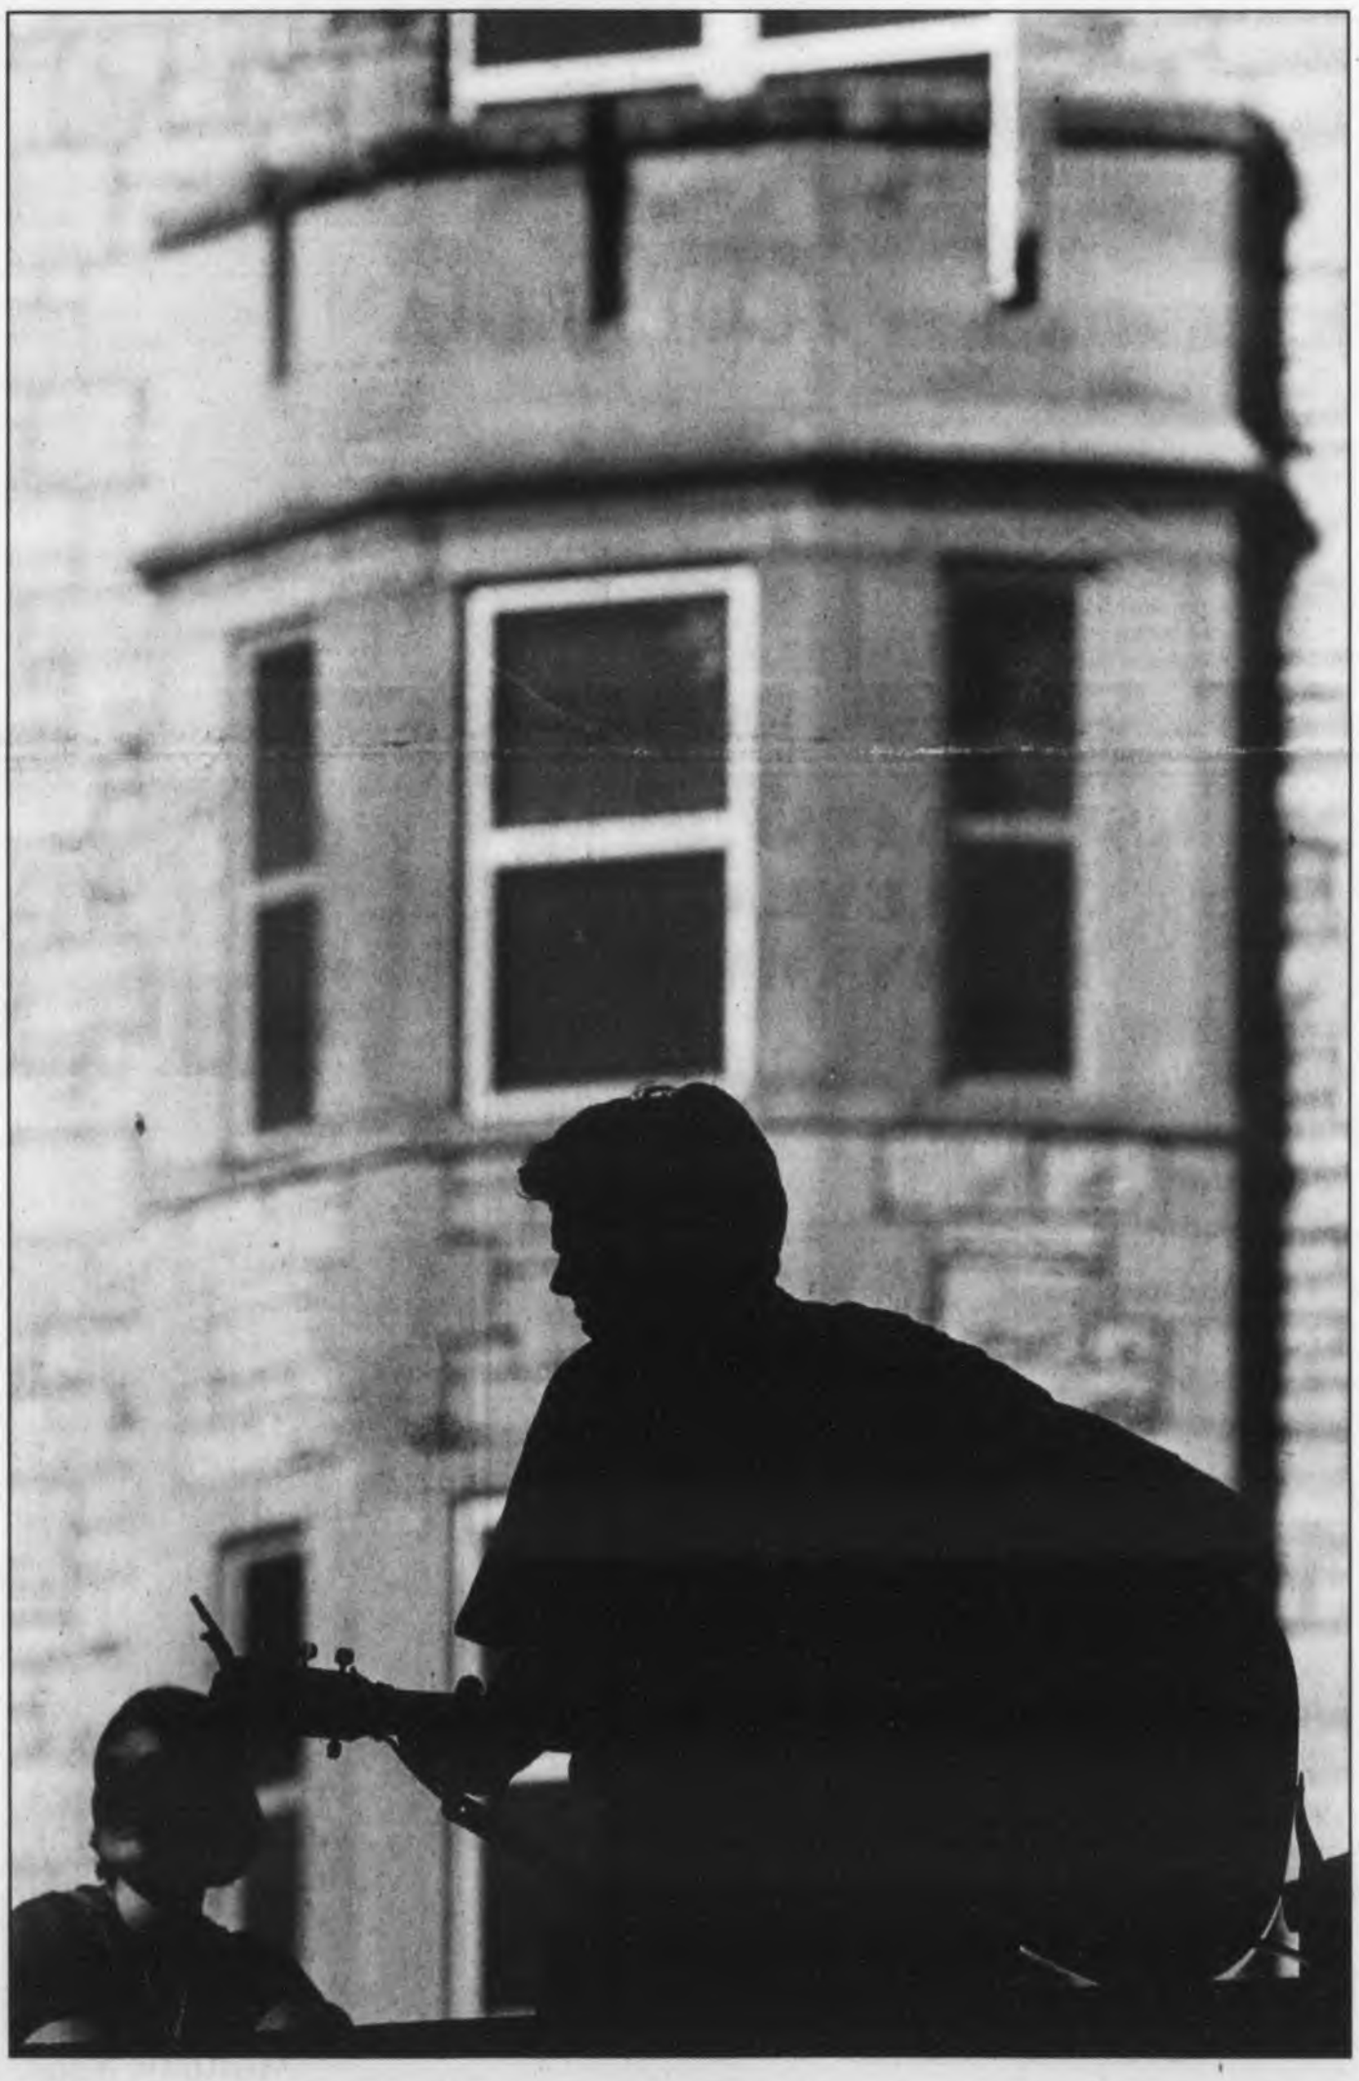
Ben Retter, junior in marketing and finance and bouncer at KJ's Bar and Dance Club, said it was easy to recognize a fake ID and it would be obvious if someone were not using their own.

"There would have to be striking similarities," he said. "You hold a picture up to somebody, and you look at them. You can tell."

Retter said he thought the change in law would make people less willing to attempt using another person's ID and cut down on the number of fake IDs.

Greg Bush, junior in agribusiness and bouncer at Lucky BrewGrille, said he knew about the law change.

"We're cracking down a lot this year," he said.



Bush said they might spot three or four fake IDs a night.

"On average, about two a night," he said.

If a bouncer notices a fake ID, it is taken and the user can only retrieve it with the assistance of a police officer. Bush said people usually never come back for the one they take.

"We keep it and give it to the owner of the bar," he said.

If it is the policy of establishment owners to turn fake IDs in to the police department, a fraudulent ID can come back to haunt a user. Once a fake ID is in the possession of the police department, laws are enforced.

Technical difficulties knock out Manhattan radio station temporarily

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

KMKF-FM 101.5, better known as K-Rock, has been forced off the air by technical difficulties.

It hopes to be up and running today.

Raubin Pierce, K-Rock program director, said the first signs of trouble came last Saturday, when the station went off the air for about two hours.

He said he called the tower to check the readings. The computers said everything was up and running, but there was not enough power.

"I initiated a couple of procedures that we have to bring the power back up, but the power would not raise enough that we would be able to hear anything over the air," Pierce said.

He said they ruled out trouble with power or electric crews because KXBZ-FM 104.7, which has its equipment in the same room at the tower, had no power problems.

The K-Rock engineer figured out the problem was with the excitor. The excitor is a piece of equipment that takes the signal from the studios and powers it for broadcast.

"Luckily, we've always had a backup transmitter," Pierce said. "Back in 1990, we moved from 101.7 to 101.5 and increased our power."

The tower the station used when it broadcasted from 101.7 is now used as a backup, but it isn't as powerful.

The excitor from the old transmitter was hooked up, and K-Rock was back on the air.

"Unfortunately, yesterday (Wednesday) about 2:50 p.m. the second excitor, the one

CORRECTION

In the Thursday, Sept. 12, edition of the Collegian, an article about changes in the accounting education curriculum and the requirements to take the CPA exam contained incorrect information.

Beginning July 1, 1997, an individual will need 150 hours of college credit to sit for the CPA exam. This new rule will require students wanting to take the exam to have an additional 30 credit hours of college credit or a master's degree. Under this new rule, the master's degree is more important for accounting graduates. The article suggested it was less important now.

Due to a reporter's error, information about students in the undergraduate program automatically entering the master's degree program is incorrect. Any student wanting to take the fifth-year master's program must apply for admission to the graduate school. Admission to the master's program requires a 3.0 undergraduate grade point average and a satisfactory score on the GMAT exam. These requirements for admission to the Master of Accountancy program are not changing.

Students with questions concerning the new requirements for the CPA exam or admission to the fifth-year Master of Accountancy program should direct them to accounting department faculty members at the College of Business Administration office at Calvin 109A or call 532-6184.

The 16 reassigned officers were implicated in the Aug. 27 ruckus, in which off-duty members of an elite police unit emerged from a downtown bar, made lewd remarks to women, then beat up and arrested two men who confronted them. A police internal investigation was put on hold while a grand jury and the FBI are investigating.

It accuses them of violating the civil rights of Isabel Correa and Kevorkian. The death was the 40th Kevorkian has acknowledged attending since 1990. Bunting, Kozma and up to 20 police officers pushed in a door and said they were there to save Correa.

Options expand campus housing; students interested

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

The horizons of on-campus student living broadened this fall with the opening of Wiley Apartments.

The W building of Jardine Terrace Apartments was renovated to become Wiley Apartments, housing students that have previously lived in the residence halls.

"Wiley Apartments are for hall students who have lived two years in the hall and are looking for something different," said Shah Hasan, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

Hasan said the apartments are part of a strategy to diversify choices of living. Wiley offers residents the privacy of their own place and still the community of residence life.

Dana Grant, assistant residence life coordinator, is working primarily with Wiley. She said focus is being directed toward building the community at Wiley by getting tenants to know their neighbors.

Grant worked with placing students in the 23 new units. She is now the liaison between Wiley and Housing and Dining Services.

Grant said Housing and Dining Services started publicizing the option late last spring and had a positive response.

"I'm real excited people are interested," she said.

Unsure what the future holds, Grant said she envisions a pick-up in attention and interest in Wiley.

The renovation at Jardine is not the first. In 1991, one of the buildings was renovated to form William's Place for single graduate and non-traditional students.

Renovations for Wiley included improvements such as the addition of carpeting, a dishwasher and a shower.

Susanne Tunstall, family housing coordinator, said there are two lists to follow when placing tenants at Jardine. The primary list consists of families, couples and single parents.

To live at Jardine, couples are required to show a marriage certificate, and birth certificates are required for children.

If availability exists after these applicants have been accommodated, single graduate students, non-traditional students, faculty and staff, or visiting scholars are allowed to reside at Jardine.

Tunstall said there is a sense of community at Jardine.

"I think people watch out for each other, and I think people really appreciate it," she said.

Tunstall said changes at Jardine have been gradual but essential to keep up with desires of the student population.

"We're here to accommodate students," she said.

Although apartments at Jardine, William's Place and Wiley are equipped with kitchens, tenants are allowed to purchase a meal plan through Housing and Dining Services. Students can eat in Kramer Food Center or Derby Food Center with hall residents.

The qualifications to live at Wiley go beyond previous residence in a hall. Once primary tenants qualify, they are allowed to bring someone else who qualifies as a roommate. That person must be of the same sex and also a student.

The 15 one-bedroom units can be occupied by one or two residents, and up to three students are allowed to live in the eight two-bedroom units.

Closed parking lots

Forty metered stalls in the K-State Student Union Lot A-29 will be blocked from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday to provide parking for mock interviews at the Union. In addition, 20 spaces in the metered lot at the Union will be closed off Tuesday. Also on Tuesday, 350 stalls in West Stadium Lot D-1 will be blocked to make room for recruiters coming to the Career Fair. David Amaro, assistant director of Parking Services, said the stalls will be closed from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Before he left for Berkeley, Asbury met with K-State players.

He is expected to return today to Manhattan. A telephone call to his hotel in Berkeley Thursday night was not returned.

Asbury signed a six-year contract this summer with the University. The contract includes a base salary of $125,000 and no buyout clauses.

K-State athletic director Max Urick did not return any of the Collegian's phone calls.

If Asbury is hiredl, sources close K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics say Urick plans to promote Assistant Coach David Campbell.

Campbell is the Wildcat's main recruiter and has been an assistant for 14 years. He has been Asbury's assistant for the last eight seasons.

While Campbell has never been a head coach, retaining him as Asbury's replacement would maintain continuity for K-State's players. Campbell declined to comment on the situation Thursday.

OPINION

EDITOR: SERA TANK 532-0730 (KAROLYI@KSU.EDU) | FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1996 | PAGE 4

IN OUR OPINION

Current drinking laws need to be re-evaluated

WHY WE CARE

Tougher laws are making it harder and more expensive to use fake IDs. But this brings up new and old issues regarding underage drinking.

Stiffer penalties on underage individuals possessing and using a fake ID card to buy alcohol, be it a driver's license or state ID, bring up both old and new questions.

It has been more than a decade since the legal drinking age was raised from 18 to 21.

Since then the argument has pivoted on two things:

If individuals can fight and die for their country, or elect a president, shouldn't they also be able to purchase and consume alcohol in their country?

Despite these questions, the fact remains that it is illegal in our country, and specifically in Kansas, to drink while underage.

Although some drinking establishments do not allow 18- to 20-year-olds on the premises, the fact remains that fake IDs are rampant among patrons of Aggieville and taverns and clubs around the country.

Aggieville needs to establish a club-type situation where students can go to have a good time and are both comfortable and unburdened by the peer pressure of alcohol.

One solution might rest with extensive marketing research, shedding light on what underage socialites actually want in terms of a bar where they can go and simply hang out.

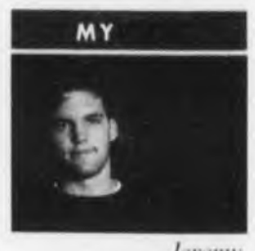
All it would take then to open such a place would be an enterprising individual with the business know-how to make it all work.

Stiffening the penalties for possessing and using a fake ID isn't going to keep people from using them.

If people want to drink, they will find a way.

And, even if a person gets arrested for a violation of the fake ID law, that doesn't mean they won't try again.

When there are individuals who have two DUIs or MIPs on their record, reason would have it there will be people with two violations of the law regarding fake IDs.



In light of both arguments and solutions, one essential point remains:

It is illegal to drink in Kansas before the age of 21.

Those who choose to drink while underage should be aware of the law as well as its penalties.

Government can't solve all problems; people have to help themselves, too

MY

STEPHENS

Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., gave the 107th Landon Lecture on Monday, which would have been the 109th birthday of her father, Alf Landon, who is the namesake of the series.

For those of you who missed the lecture, you missed a good speech from a person who has spent a lot of time inside the Beltway in Washington, and yet remains true to her Kansas roots, rather than being swept away by the glitz of our nation's capital.

This is not an easy thing to do, especially in an era that finds many in this land turning to the government for support, whether it be financial, legal or educational.

A growing number of people have come to be dependent on the government to pay the bills, enhance or enforce a set of rights or to put them through school.

And while this might provide a short-term remedy to the problem at the end, few stop to consider the long-term consequences.

The odd thing about this dependency on the government is that it has come to be expected.

For many people, there is no longer any question as to whether or not the government should provide support to various groups in this country.

The question of the hour is how to provide it.

However, the former question has been asked before, and it will surely be asked again. In the early 19th century, Davy Crockett, then serving in the Congress before going on to fight at the Alamo, said once the government's coffers had been opened, they could never be closed. In fact, he said this during a debate on whether or not the government should provide aid to widows.

Few people would recognize his stance for what it was.

By opposing a program that was developed in the special interest of a certain group, no matter how worthy or noble the cause, Crockett protected the right of the country as a whole to care for the widows in a manner they deemed fit.

Today, he would surely be labeled as mean, insensitive and extremist. However, no one can argue with the wisdom of his words, for the years since then have proven him correct.

This is not to say that people, and by this I do not mean government, should not be attentive to the needs of their community. However, once the government has created a program for one special interest, every other special interest will want to have a share of the pie. In other words, once the government subsidizes llamas, the goat milk industry will also want its fair share.

This only makes sense.

If the Joneses are getting a certain amount of government aid, why shouldn't all their neighbors think they are entitled to the same benefits? In this way, our government has evolved from one that protects the general interest to one that metes out resources to the most vocal or well-placed special interests.

To those of you who believe the government protects against the ills of life and can provide services that will help you enjoy a better living, I point to the field of government-subsidized education. In the past 10 years, no one can deny the quality of education has declined rather than increased.

Kassebaum even pointed this out in her speech. She said, "Quality and excellence in education couldn't be more important to us ... We do a great disservice to those students on financial aid who come to college to take remedial reading. That's not your fault. It's our fault."

However, she has also come to the conclusion that, "Government can't solve that problem, it has to come from our own families and communities that we demand quality."

It is not possible to legislate high-quality schools. High-quality schools are the result of people striving for excellence together, and not the result of people meeting the requirements of the law, because the law always dictates what is to be minimally expected, not what is to be achieved at the finest hour.

This is not to say we should eliminate every government program in one fell swoop, but question the value of currently existing programs and be highly skeptical of new ones. Those in favor of granting benefits to special interests should be compelled to examine why they are not in favor of the general interest.

To paraphrase a wise man, a house full of special interests cannot stand.

MIRACLE: mir'-i-kël n. 1. an extraordinary event believed to manifest a supernatural work of God. 2. An extremely outstanding or unusual event, thing or accomplishment. — Webster's New Encyclopedic Dictionary

Maybe it was too much Peter, Paul and Mary or my mother's bleeding heart. Maybe it was rekindled by reading three volumes of "Chicken Soup for the Soul," or listening to "Age of Aquarius" and "The Prophet" every morning for years.

However it happened, in spite of my own tired cynicism and pessimistic projections for the world, I can't lose this underlying faith that the more the world sinks in despair, the more the collective conscience reaches through logic to fetch miracles.

The word miracle comes from the Latin word mirari — to wonder — which is also the root of the word mirage. One is defined as an illusion, the other as illusive.

Both have been explained through myths and fables for centuries, but the mirage is proven to be fantasy, while the credibility of miracles outside of religion is the topic of exhaustible debate.

I should clarify that I don't necessarily equate a miracle with Lazarus rising from the dead, astral light shows or burning bushes.

I believe coincidence is a miracle, because it is the wrong turns and unplanned paths that take us where we didn't know we wanted to go.

I believe a miracle is when a tragedy seems the recipe for greatness.

I used to know a homemaker whose second child had Down syndrome. When she realized how inadequate the education programs for Down syndrome children were, she began lobbying, helped rewrite these programs, went back to school and became politically active.

That to me is a miracle.

When I was $50 short of my rent, and I got a $51 check in the mail that day from a job I had quit months before, I knew it was an act of supernatural mercy.

A few years ago, after sleeping through my alarm clock, I discovered if I prayed for God to wake me up in the morning, something would wake me up, the phone, doorbell, etc. It never failed.

When I decided that was working, I started praying for God to remind me of lines for poems I didn't have time to write down, or quotes, or just to remember someone's name or to call someone.

When I told a friend I was doing this, she said she thought it was selfish and God was not my personal secretary. So, I quit doing it. The next day I overslept, and the day after that I overslept, and that continued until I decided there was no way I would graduate without my divine alarm clock.

It is usually when I am desperate or just acting out of mindless habit that I consult with this cosmic conscience, but I believe these spiritual tools are accessible to anyone, no being put on hold, no waiting lists, and you can call it God, Goddess, Jesus, Allah, Great Spirit or Jane and it will still work.

These miracles could be dismissed by those who worship logic as coincidence. Others attribute them to gods or prophets.

I believe they all stem from the same source and the more we recognize them and use this source, the more we become a channel of its light.

I'm not one to quote scripture, having never attended a Sunday School class and referring to Jesus only as another guru, but one of my favorite quotes regardless of its biblical origin is, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

The 20th century is not the friendliest time zone for prophets. They have to disguise themselves to dodge persecution, talk shows and diagnosis as schizophrenic.

After all, few motels have stables anymore.

Unsatisfactory library visit

Editor,

K-State has always impressed me with its overwhelmingly helpful administration and faculty as well as students. If K-State were a private business, it would win a prize for customer satisfaction and customer service.

It is the friendly, helpful atmosphere that separates K-State from other universities. Unfortunately, several recent experiences have led me to believe Farrell Library is not living up to K-State's high standards.

If you have not been in the newly renovated building yet, you should go. It is a beautiful building, and there is plenty of room for studying. However, if you go with the intent of finding any specific articles or using the computers to do a literature search, you might have trouble.

In my recent attempts to complete what should have been a simple and not time-consuming literature search, I spent hours in the library frustrated. Not only did the three computers I tried each have different flaws, (i.e. only printing half of the abstract I needed, quitting in the middle of my search and completely freezing one computer), I also had trouble finding anyone to help me.

After waiting 20 minutes at a desk with a big sign that said, "Ask for help here," I wandered down to the second floor and waited in a long line of students. Once I had finally tracked down the assistant and attempted to show her the problems I was having with the computer, I could not get into PsychLit, the program I was using, because only eight people in this entire University can use the program at the same time.

When I asked the assistant if the library was hiring — because I know many people looking for jobs — she said it was not. Apparently the budget did not allow for any more student assistants.

I became very frustrated and disappointed, not only because the library was not living up to my expectations of K-State, but because there was this expensive building that was too frustrating and full of glitches to be useful. The librarians and assistants who were there had to deal with a frustrated student who waited for long lengths of time to talk with them.

My recent experience at the library led me to several suggestions. If no one is working at the desk that says, "Ask for help here," then it should say, "Ask for help downstairs."

Also, there should be more staff, some of whom could be temporary until students familiarize themselves with the new library, the computer glitches get worked out and the library has been fully rearranged.

In addition to more staff, the computer problems need to be alleviated. I also would recommend more licenses for PsychLit, as well as other programs with limited licenses, especially because these programs are now accessible from public labs. I am aware my suggestions might not be realistic. However, I have come to expect friendly, helpful services from K-State. An institution as important as the library should not be held to lower standards.

Fraternity was joking around

Editor,

This is in response to Suzie Solenberger's letter about the men of Lambda Chi Alpha. I'm sorry to hear Solenberger's experience with the Lambda Chis was an unpleasant one, but I am offended she would imply the Lambda Chis have poor character.

These guys like to joke around, and I'm sure they meant nothing by the comments that were made. I know most of these young men personally, and they are very nice guys, as well as gentlemen.

I don't think she had a right to trash a fraternity because of two or three guys. I admit, that was a poor representation of the Lambda Chis, but I can honestly say I don't think I could know a better group of men.

So if the students of K-State are to make their own judgment about the Lambda Chis, maybe they should heed the words of someone who knows them.

Changes in getting to hospital during the game-day traffic

Editor,

Due to the high volume of traffic and congestion during post-game times of the K-State football games, the Riley County Police Department in conjunction with the Emergency Medical Services and Mercy Health Center staff have designated the following procedures:

Approach the Mercy Health Center on College Avenue by approaching from the east of west Kimball Avenue and then south on College Avenue.

Place your vehicle's emergency flashers on the flash mode.

Tell the officer at the traffic control point that you are going to proceed to the Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

The officer will then make the necessary arrangements in order to allow your access.

Bargain-shopping on campus

Some of the best food bargains in Manhattan might just be on the K-State campus.

Flour, fresh-baked bread, meat, milk, ice cream and cheese are some of the fresh foods made on the K-State campus. They are all available to the public at competitive prices.

Even though Call Hall ice cream is practically famous on campus, it is not well-known that fresh milk and cheese are also processed there.

Dairy plant manager Sri Adapa, graduate student in dairy processing, said the advantage of purchasing milk at Call is the high quality of the milk.

"The milk is much fresher, because we process it twice a week. We also don't have to go through all of the transporting that most other places do. It is made fresh here in the building," Adapa said.

Adapa also said there are usually between nine and 10 kinds of cheeses sold at Call. All the cheeses are prepared and sold fresh at Call, Adapa said.

Next door to Call is Weber Hall, which also offers good deals on fresh food. A meat sale is offered to the public from 2 to 6 p.m. every Friday.

Animal science students at Weber process beef, pork and lamb. They learn how to slaughter the animals and prepare them for packaging.

T.A. Hays, junior in animal science, said Weber is one of the major suppliers of beef to campus.

"All of the hamburgers at K-State football games are prepared by the students. Patties, sausage and meat are supplied to all of the dorms," Hays said.

Hays said animal science students frequently prepare meat for large independent gatherings. He said large groups often have pig roasts or cookouts for which they supply the meat.

In addition to Call and Weber, Shellenberger Hall has groups that sell both flour and fresh-baked breads.

The Bakery Science Club has a bake sale from 3 to 5 p.m. in Shellenberger. It offers freshly made loaves of bread and an assortment of cookies and muffins.

Sarah Scott, junior in milling science and president of the club, said the bake sales were beneficial to the students, because the students gain experience in their field.

"It allows us to practice the services that we learn in class," Scott said.

Scott said the Bakery Science Club also has large bake sales for the holidays, Family Weekend and the All-University Open House.

Shellenberger has a flour sale from noon to 4 p.m. every Wednesday. The milling science students grind the flour and package it for sale.

Brandon Unruh, junior in milling science, said the flour sale is a great learning experience for the students.

"They learn how to grind the flour and how to market it for sale," Unruh said.

Unruh also said the flour is a higher quality than most flour available at stores. Because of this, Unruh said Shellenberger has had some of the same customers for 20 years.

Tonight's Dave Matthews Band show at Sandstone Amphitheatre has been canceled.

Bassist Stefan Lessard's 3-week-old daughter, Aslan Mozelle, died Wednesday morning of undetermined causes, and shows in Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis,Ill; and Kansas City, Mo., have since been postponed indefinitely.

Paige Turner, promotions and marketing director for the Kansas City show, said everyone is working hard to make sure an alternate date can be found.

"We're trying to get it taken care of," Turner said. "Quite frankly, we're waiting on management."

Turner said it was up to the band to determine when the concert will take place.

"When you have a death in the family, that's the last thing on your mind," Turner said. "But we're going to do our best to make sure we get the show to come back to Kansas City."

A fund has been set up in Mozelle's name to benefit Tandem Friends School. Donations can be sent to:
